Let us suppose for a moment that Mr. Lamond had chosen to be not a pianist, but a violinist. He would in that case have become the same sort of player as Joachim. Yet it may be doubted whether he could have filled the Queen's Hall for a programme of Bach's unaccompanied sonatas. The "Kreutzer" would have drawn an audience, but to perform the "Kreutzer" he would have had to engage a pianist of approximately equal reputation. The solo pianist can take his choice from the music of three centuries; he can make up a first-class programme in any style and up to any degree of difficulty. The violinist, when he wishes to give a concert by himself, is in a very different position. He can give a sonata recital, he can lead a quartet; but there are many excellent players who feel now and then that quartet concerts and sonata recitals are not enough. They want, for one evening at any rate, to stand alone and express their own personalities without the restricting influence of partnership on equal terms. It is a perfectly legitimate ambition. Yet the fact remains that of all concerts which profess to be serious, the violin recital is generally the dullest and the least artistic. There will be a concerto, with the orchestral part played on the pianoforte by an average respectable accompanist; but as nobody wants to listen to him scrambling through an awkward arrangement of the long interludes. The violinist stands uncomfortably idle, unable even to screw up his courage by joining in unnoticed as many do when they play with an orchestra, the allusiveness of the tutti is scrambled altogether and the structural balance of the work destroyed. It may be dull to listen to an orchestral introduction played on the pianoforte, and the pianoforte can never give the effect of mass and weight which even a small orchestra produces; but the treatment of the subjects in the solo part requires in most cases the preliminary statement of the orchestra in order to make it properly intelligible.

After the concerto comes the group of pretty little things—Chopin nocturne and the rest selected from that mass of "hyphenated music" on which violinists are far more dependent than any virtuoso pianist. And then, to wind up with, Bazzini's "Ronde des Lutins" or something in the Hungarian manner. It is not altogether the fault of the wretched violinist. "You can't be always playing sonatas," he says with perfect justice. But whereas the pianist has Schumann's "Carnaval," Chopin's Nocturnes and Impromptus, Brahms' Intermezzi, to say nothing of all the modern literature of short or moderately short pianoforte pieces, the violinist has practically nothing whatever that corresponds to it. Composers of repute will write violin sonatas and quartets, but since the days of Paganini they have utterly refused to write miscellaneous pieces for the violin.

In the eighteenth century people wrote sonatas and concertos for the violin because they wanted to play on their fiddles the same sort of music that the Senesinos and Farinelli were singing at the opera. They cast their music in that form because it was the standard form of the operatic aria. The violin became the common domestic instrument the accompaniments were of very slight importance. It was only the development of the pianoforte that made the violin sonata a partnership on equal terms.

Paganini and Spohr were the last of the old generation of violinist-composers. Corelli, Tartini and the rest were all violinsts themselves as well as composers—real violinists, not just composers who occasionally took up the viola like Mozart and Beethoven. It is as composers that we remember them today: Paganini is no exception, and Spohr, if he is remembered at all, is remembered less for his violin music than for his oratorios. But in the nineteenth century the best composers did not become violinists, although many violinists went on trying to be composers. Modern music has developed almost entirely from the pianoforte. The pianoforte has led the way in harmonic experiment, in modernity of expression, and also in modernity of execution. Looking at the purely technical side, there has been an enormous advance during the last hundred years. Of the violin that cannot be said. The virtuoso of today who wants to exhibit his technique can find nothing more showy than Paganini. Modern virtuoso music for the violin may be more difficult in certain directions, but it is completely out of touch with modern pianoforte or orchestral music. One never hears anything that would have puzzled Paganini in a musical sense at all. He might have been puzzled by the violin concertos of Delius and Elgar, but difficult as they are, they do not belong to the category of virtuoso music.

This is perhaps the appropriate moment for a digression on the nature of virtuoso music. The sort of stuff that fiddlers love remains old-fashioned because it is designed to allow the player to concentrate all his attention on mechanical dexterity. Mechanical dexterity does require a certain mental concentration, and in order to economize brain-power the composer exacts a minimum of concentration on purely musical difficulties. When music is at all near to expressing anything that would have puzzled Paganini, it is clear that the next note is to sound like before he heard it. That requires mental effort. When music is written in the conventional rut, the finding the right note becomes largely automatic. Pianists now play with perfect ease certain types of scale and arpeggio which in Clementi's day would have been regarded as being not music at all. The whole tone scale will very soon be within the grasp of the sort of people who play "La Priere d'une Vierge." But violinists, it seems, are still living in the days of Thekla Badarzewska.

Their virtuosity has contributed nothing to modern music. Paganini was the spiritual father of Liszt, and so the ancestor of all modern pianoforte music; but in the direct line he has had no progeny worthy of his name. The technical achievements of the pianist are absorbed into serious artistic music; indeed, many of the most remarkable technical achievements originate with serious artistic music. But the virtuoso music which the modern sensational violinist plays has no connexion with modern chamber-music at all. The composers of quartets and sonatas entirely ignore the "plug de perles" which Bazzini, Hubay, Popper and the rest have cast before them. Yet there is no reason why it should be regarded as immoral to write melodies in harmonies or pizzicatos for the left hand. Paganini still remains a great composer; if anyone doubt this, let him go and hear Miss Jelly d'Aranyi.

THE GLASTONBURY PLAYERS

A London Committee has been formed, with Sir Edward Elgar as Chairman, to bring the Glastonbury Players to London. In view of the remoteness of Glastonbury and the limitation of its capacity for visitors, it has been felt that some special steps should be taken to bring before a larger public the musical and dramatic work now being carried on in the little town under the direction of Mr. Rutland Boughton. Since August, 1914, when the work began and (despite a break of over two years when Mr. Boughton was doing military service), over a hundred performances have been given and six new British operas have been produced. At the last Summer Festival the tiny local hall proved as inadequate for the audiences as it has always been for the performers.

The London Committee has therefore arranged with Miss Hayes to give the company a fortnight’s season at the Old Vic, from May 30 to June 9. The Players will bring to town Mr. Boughton’s “Immortal Hour,” which, since its production in 1914, has received the Carnegie award. Two other distinctly excellent works will be given: the seventeenth-century masque Venus and Adonis, by John Blow, and a programme of choral and orchestral music. The conductor will be Mr. Charles Kennedy-Scott, who helped the Glastonbury people when first they produced “The Immortal Hour” in 1914.

WAGNER AND GREEK TRAGEDY

WAGNER'S DRAMAS AND GREEK TRAGEDY. By Pearl Cleveland Wilson, Ph.D. (New York: Columbia University Press. 8s. 6d. net.)

ANY thesis, as we all know, can be prejudiced by a too great anxiety to prove it; and the thesis contained in this volume, which is briefly that Wagner’s music-dramas have a close resemblance in form to Greek tragedy, is spoiled by the author's accentuation of resemblances which have no significance, in the shadow of which the significant resemblances are lost in gloom. Mrs. Wilson’s industry would be admirable if it were equalled by her discrimination, but, as it is, it confuses her argument instead of defining it. When she discovers similarities, for instance, between Odysseus and the “Flying Dutchman,” and between Calypso, who keeps Odysseus on her island, and Venus, who keeps Tannhäuser in her grotto; and when she says that “the story of ‘Lohengrin’ resembles that of Zeus and Semele”; it is obvious that she is mistaking for a mere resemblance between Wagner and the Greek what is in reality a similarity of racial myths. We know, however, that myths the world over have not only a superficial, but a fundamental similarity; and the resemblances between the myths treated by the Greek tragedians and Wagner are, therefore, not surprising, but to be expected. Many of the other resemblances discovered by Mrs. Wilson are, it is to be feared, equally without foundation. The “tendency to fable” of which the连接 between Antigone and Brünhilde, unites both to Cordelia; “the perfect clarity of youthful innocence,” of which Ion and Elisa are the types, can be paralleled by scores of examples from English literature alone; and Promethes and Siegfried have a “flame of courage” no more “unchangeable” than Milton’s Satan and Ibsen’s Brand. These resemblances are not resemblances which define either Greek tragedy or the music dramas of Wagner. Yet that there is a resemblance the volume leaves one with little doubt. The most relevant chapter is that upon Wagner’s Use of the Orchestra as a Medium of Poetic Expression. It is clear that Wagner tried to make the orchestra fulfill the role of chorus, as well as of accompaniment, and do much more. The question, indeed, is not whether there is a resemblance between “The Ring” and the “Orestes,” but whether Wagner imitated Greek tragedy. There is little doubt that he did.

CONCERTS

The sixth concert of the 108th season of the Philharmonic Society provided a rather dull programme. Rachmaninoff’s Symphony in E minor is a professorial work which always does what it should (except in the excessive use of muted harmonies); it has no surprises and very little interest. Much the same might be said of the other programme, for Madame Suggia’s playing of the Bach unaccompanied Suite (or most of it) in C major. Her playing of Bach is superb, alike in beauty of style, understanding of the music and the singing quality of the voice produced. There are a dignity, volume and sweep about those dance movements as interpreted by Madame Suggia which no one else can attain. Is it after all purely a question of technique, and a fact that there are only one or two cellists in the world whose technique is really faultless? It is seldom indeed that such perfection of technique is united with such an understanding. Lalo’s Concerto in any other hands seems detestable; Madame Suggia made it sound like great music, and it was worthily accompanied by the orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald’s direction.

The British Music Society’s concerts last week certainly proved the necessity for the Society’s existence, and also demonstrated the wisdom of its pronouncement that “all- British concerts are not to be recommended.” Some people seem to have assumed that the Society intended to give a festival of purely British music, and criticized it severely for including foreign works in its programmes. It would probably have drawn larger audiences to hear what was good in British music if it had had the courage to be more severe in its choice and less exclusive of foreign works. Undoubtedly the greatest success of all the programmes was the performance of Vaughan Williams’ “London Symphony.” It has been considerably revised by the composer, and may now be regarded as in its final definite shape. Mr. Albert Coates thoroughly entered into the spirit of the work and secured a magnificent performance of it, the finest performance which it has yet received; but at the same time we must not forget to honour Mr. Geoffrey Toye and Mr. Adrian Boult, who bore the brunt of introducing the symphony at a time when it was less clear in expression and audiences less prepared to understand it.

“Heldenleben” was sacrificed to the protests of a few noisy persons who for some reason have made up their minds that it is “un-British.” Prussianism. “Symphony of Ecstasy” was substituted for it, and supplied an equal amount of noise and sentimentality without endangering the patriotic reputation of its admirers.

The discussions held during the three mornings of the Congress were less exciting, but more valuable as an earnest of the Society’s future work. The various chairman were thoroughly efficient in keeping business to practical lines, and the majority of the speakers made really sound and useful contributions to questions which are of fundamental importance to the welfare of British music.

The Bohemian Czech Quartet started their series of five concerts with a Czech programme that included quartets by Dvořák and Novák, and a pianoforte quintet by Josef Smeták, who has for many years been a member of the quartet. This last work was composed in 1883, when it was dedicated to Brahms, and revised quite recently. In certain places the revision has been very considerable, and it is probable that they have produced a happy result. The quintet is a sound piece of nineteenth-century writing, and the addition of a few modern harmonies has only accentuated the old-fashioned character of the rest. The quartet by Novák is by no means a new work, but shows originality of treatment and deserves to be given oftener. It is a real combination of Schumann, Brahms and Schubert, and the third a classical programme. It would have been better, in view of London audiences, to make the programmes less homogeneous and to distribute the classics and early romantics over the series. Most supporters of chamber music in this country are people who prefer to hear the older works, though often quite willing to sit out more modern music.

TOYING WITH UTOPIA

LITTLE THEATRE.—"Husbands for All." By G. E. Jennings.

IT is the Utopians who make Utopia a bore. Who cares a jot about what strange laws imaginary peoples go on? But to see the society in which we live turned topsy-turvy—that is always worth the price of admission. The thrill with which we read in "The Sleeper Awakes" of the "charming little woman" who was "one of the subsidiary wives of the Anglican Bishop of London" would not be felt if we substituted for the last words the Grand Lama of Nephelococcygia. Therefore let authors plan their Utopias not in the clouds, but in the future—in as near a future as imagination will allow.

The author of "Husbands for All" has grasped this important principle. The play takes place "a few years hence," and London does service for the Isle of Utopia. To the eye not much is changed. Pictures have gone from bad to worse, which seems a likely evolution, and fashions have grown extremely unbecoming, a forecast which, after glancing through the first number of Feminina, we feel to be truly dismal. Yet really everything has changed. The Government—here indeed Miss Jennings makes a heavy call on our imaginative second-wind—takes the problems of peace as seriously as those of war. There is a Controller of everything who actually controls. The food shortage is remedied by compulsory tabloids, the servant-problem by prohibiting servants (perhaps we exaggerate the change in official methods), war-slang is taboo, and, as the difficulty of the birth-rate remains, a form of marital conscription is imposed. By the "Lateral Marriages Act" you not only may but must, unless you can wangle an exemption (we should be fined for the phrase in wise Utopia), fool a medical board, or exhibit seven children, have at least two wives. Applied, not to Plato's guardians, but (so to speak) to ourselves, this measure is full of entertaining possibilities.

We fear Miss Jennings has not made the most of them. She has achieved neither a Shavian apologue for the new order, nor a Gilbertian vindication of the old. When we heard of a gentleman who had selected for his marriages the girl from the dairy and the lift-woman at Earl's Court Tube, our hopes rose high. When the trio appeared in the habitations, and accompanied by the jests of Victorian farce they were killed, scarcely to revive at any later moment of the evening. From the episode of the simple-hearted hubby, John Eastwood, who preferred to go to Dartmoor as a "conchie" rather than pin his sweet little wife by taking his legal second, no more fun could be expected than Mr. Malcolm Cherry's admirable laconic comedy and Miss Doris Lytton's sympathetic charm put into it. Something, we thought, might possibly be in store when a wicked Parliament raised the age-limit for marital service and entangled the profoundly celibate souled Controller, Austin Murray, in his own net, but nothing above the farce level came of it. Nor was Mr. Campbell Gullin's Staccato style particularly adapted to the part of the austere legislator. Miss Dorothy Minto, on the other hand, did everything for "Jenima," the illegitimate maid-of-all-work, and (we rather gathered) the raison d'être of the piece, opposing cockney sentiment to scientific State-management in the dialect which Miss Jennings wields with rare force.

Moreover, though Jenima may have knocked some sense into the Controller, and induced him, while taking to his breast his charming secretary, Coral Edison (Miss Edna Best), to vow that his Act should "go up the chimney to-morrow," we do not see what power she had to cut the knot this way. Even in Utopia, if Utopia is a parliamentary State, laws do not vanish in smoke because the man who brought them in is tired of them. Fable has its rules as stringent as those of fact, and Miss Jennings' conclusion is not a conclusion at all. You need not enter Utopia unless you wish to, but once you are in you can't get out by the chimney.

ART VERSUS ARGUMENT

ST. MARTIN'S THEATRE—"The Skin Game." By John Galsworthy.

THERE is a moment in Mr. Galsworthy's earlier play "The Silver Box" at which a window is lifted and the moan of desolate children drifts up in accusation from the street to the listening rich man who is the cause of their plight. It is sheer melodrama thrust on a piece of work which in other respects held conviction, if not significance; an old stage trick, this cry heard for an instant "off," familiar as that of the strange face at a window, and there is hardly an example of his writings for the theatre into which Mr. Galsworthy has not introduced some sort of equivalent. Since we know him as an idealist whose energy is concentrated upon the blending of art and deduction in the theatre, it is, he is not altogether at ease about these remarkable draughts of his, each written with the severity and precision of a legal tribunal, his characters as aloof from one another, though they be kinsfolk by virtue of blood or love, as obligation would make them once they had entered the judgment chamber of actual life. He seems aware of some quality lacking that might make his play an awakened of the imagination; and we would have our hesitation well apparent before venturing to account for such an experienced writer's use of these puerilities of sensationalism as his one way of trying to quicken with colour and warmth and vitality what otherwise is nothing more than a dramatic treatise on the futility or inevitability of certain modes of action.

In "The Skin Game" Mr. Galsworthy employs for a similar purpose what has long been the common possession of theatre-craftsmen—an awareness of the infinite possibilities of the stealthily opening door. There is, of course, no reason why these common possessions should not be made use of by him; the greatest of all playmakers rang the changes on a ghost already worn by overwork to the merest shadow. But the maid at the St. Martin's who spies on her mistress (with an uncanny and never-ceasing smile) by peering through the door for a moment and withdrawing—peering for similar moments, indeed, throughout the scene—appears to have no part whatever in the play's unity, the information she is able to gather leaking out at the crisis through distinctly other channels. Incongruous to extremity is this melodramatic element in relation to Mr. Galsworthy's general scheme; and we are tempted to suggest that if he must follow a blind alley he might just as well have gone a step further and made the butler peer through a second door at the same moment as the maid peers through the first. The double espionage would be equally legitimate, possibly less ridiculous, and far more sinister.

By any such cheapening of his method Mr. Galsworthy is in danger of missing completely the only true way out of the trouble. He has the actors, Miss Meggie Albanesi, Miss Helen Haye, Miss Mary Clark, and Mr. Edmund Gwenn would be reliable in face of any demand he could make. The materials of his expression are adequate enough in themselves; in "The Skin Game" there are the aristocratic Hillcorks pitched in bitter feud against the "self-made" Hornblowers; and there is Mr. Hornblower's daughter-in-law, whose sordid past is discovered and made deadly use of by Mrs. Hillcrist. If a dramatist were to work on such a theme as an artist and with the artist's freedom, the warmth and colour and vitality would come

THE GRAVES OF THE FALLEN
To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

SIR,—The Council of the Royal Institute of British Architects, having examined the proposals of the War Graves Commission embodied in the descriptive account entitled “The Graves of the Fallen,” consider them extremely satisfactory. They especially urge that the principle of uniform headstones, combined with the accentuating features of a cross of sacrifice and stone of remembrance, should be maintained as a fine aesthetic expression of the common service and sacrifice they commemorate. They further urge that the advice of the competent designers employed by the Commission should be accepted without reserve in order to ensure simple and dignified treatment of the War Cemeteries abroad.

We are, Sir,
Your obedient servants,
John W. Simpson, President.
Ian Macalister, Secretary.

THE MECHANICS OF ELIZABETHAN PLAYWRITING
To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

SIR,—Mr. W. J. Lawrence is no doubt right in maintaining in his article under the above title (ATHENÆUM, April 30, p. 575) that in drawing their characters the Elizabethan dramatists often took into account the physical peculiarities of the actors when they were to interpret them, but one of his examples, I think, is based on a misunderstanding. He writes: “There could be no point in Lady Macbeth’s reflection,

The raven himself is hoarse
That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan
Under my battlements
unless a hoarse-voiced hirling had been specially chosen to play the part of the messenger.” But, as it seems to me, this reflection is prompted not by the voice of the servant who appears on the stage, but by his description of the actual messenger. This man, whom we do not see or hear at all, has travelled at top speed to announce the king’s approach, and

Almost dead for breath had scarcely more
Than would make up his message.
It is this picture of the breathless courier gasping out his great news that suggests to the Lady the hoarse croaking of the raven, not any peculiarity in his fellow-servant who merely brings in the message.

May 9, 1920.

Yours, &c.,
Gordon Crosse.

SIR,—Let me correct Mr. W. J. Lawrence’s statement concerning my list of the characters in Shakespeare which are definitely thin men, almost Living Skeletons, and were obviously intended to display an individual personality. I advised the Apothecary, Pinch, Robert Falsenbridge, the First Bearde, Holofernes, Starvling, and Petruchio’s Tailor, as characters specially invented for this actor. Gunt, Aegon, Egeus, Febole, would also be suitable for him. These are all small parts in the earlier plays. Since the Stratford Town edition appeared, I have identified the particular actor: the Quarto of “2 Henry IV.” names, instead of “Beadle,” the actor Sinklo.

There is at present no clue to the identity of the female impersonators—one short, one tall—who are required in the earlier and middle comedies.

This theory, that Shakespeare adapted his conceptions to the physical peculiarities of his interpreters, I developed more than forty years ago; it much interested Halliwell-Phillipps, G. A. Sala, and especially Professor Dowden. See also Secombe and Allen’s “Age of Shakespeare,” ii. 102. It appears to me that Shakespearian investigation should follow this and similar lines. At the end of “The Comedy of Errors” every character is on the stage, except Pinch. Why is he absent? He was required to play Aegon. Cordelia disappears after the opening of “King Lear”; the Fool then appears; after Act III. he disappears, and Cordelia reappears.

Yours faithfully,
H. DAVY.

MUSIC AND ITS INFLUENCE
To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

DEAR SIR,—Reading through a book titled “Impressions and Comments,” by Havelock Ellis, I was attracted by the following paragraph:

Why is it that, notwithstanding my profound admiration for Beethoven, and the delight he frequently gives me, I yet feel so disquieted by that master and so restively hostile to his prevailing tempo? I always feel that he is a Satyr among musicians, a fallen angel in the darkness who is perpetually seeking to lift his way back to happiness, and to enter on the impossible task of taking the Kingdom of Heaven by violence.

This paragraph is striking because it proves conclusively the machiavelism of Beethoven. Not that this fact has ever required any proof, but a remark such as this serves well to show that his music is Beethoven’s autobiography.

I assume that the writer was, at the time of writing, unacquainted with the character of Beethoven’s life. It is. I think, almost generally known (I implore nothing to Mr. Havelock Ellis) that Beethoven, from his childhood, waged perpetual warfare against adversity in every shape and form. Hunger, impecuniousness, and unrecognized talents burdened his youth, and, just as he was entering on, and beginning to enjoy, a more fortunate phase in his career, he was visited with that infirmity, difficult above all things for a man of his character and temperament to bear, deafness. And yet through all his adversity he was striving after “joy,” which for a brief period only he tasted. And even that period brought him no material gain. It was the joy of the conqueror over his suffering, but his suffering did not cease.

I do not propose to write a biography of Beethoven’s life. I write with the intention of attempting to remind people of a latterly much-forgotten fact, that music has a meaning and an interpretation by which impressionable men and women may profit.

Few can deny the regrettable fact that the standard of music is deteriorating. I refuse to believe, however, that the mind of the average person is so shallow as to prefer the inane strains of a popular rag-time to the works of a master of music. After all, what is the result of the former but a monotonous aesthetic exfoliation as opposed to the soul-scouring and uplifting influence of the latter?

One has been hearing lately of the moral degeneration of the world, said to be attributable to the war. Indirectly I have no doubt this is true, but I am firmly convinced that the degeneration is, to a very great extent, due to the rapid growth of cheap and sensuous music which has affected less stable wits.

Life is the molting of ideals to form a harmony, and one’s ideals are drawn from the surrounding atmosphere. If, therefore, this atmosphere is corrupt with sensuousness, our ideals will have a flimsy basis and we will hold but little harmony. Yet, however, this phase has passed—and I am certain that, when the world has ceased to simmer over the furnace of the last five years, it will pass—music will again attain its exalted peak from which it has been temporarily dislodged, and the world will thrill to the poem of its redemption.

THE LIFE OF FOGAZZARO

To those who know Fogazzaro from his books alone this biography will be both a revelation and a confirmation. He was no regular purveyor of a yearly volume, and even the most superficial of readers must have guessed that he put a good deal of himself into each of his novels. But we now know that they are a reflection of his personal history to a far greater extent than most people can possibly have realized. Sig. Gallarati-Scotti describes the surroundings of the early years in considerable detail—the tyrannical old grandfather, the religious upbringing by that true Catholic and patriot, his father, and the influence of his saintly aunt and uncle, Sister Maria Innocente and Don Giuseppe, with the schooldays in Vicenza, where Zanella, who introduced him to Heine, was his tutor. Then came the university, first at Padua and afterwards at Turin, where he did little but enjoy himself, Luigi Luzzati being a fellow-student and afterwards a lifelong friend. Arrigo Boito's friendship dated from early days in Milan. Fogazzaro took up the law to please his father, sorely against his will, the family then being in financial difficulties, but he abandoned it before his marriage. He had always wished to devote himself to literature, though even Zanella disapproved the idea, and he never seriously weakened in his purpose.

As a young man Fogazzaro had lost his faith, but for one of his temperament a return to the Church was only a question of time. His conversion, which was as sudden and as genuine as Manzoni's, followed upon the reading of Gratry's "Philosophie du Crédé." Fogazzaro's mystical tendencies date from early childhood, when at Oria he was suddenly seized with an irresistible conviction "that in the things around me, in the dearly loved country, there was a Spirit, a living Being which understood me and loved me in return." and he never lost this sense of intimate communion with Nature, which largely inspired his first book, the volume of poems devoted to his beloved Valsolda.

Sig. Gallarati-Scotti tells us that Fogazzaro's whole life was a long struggle against the temptations of the senses, against an overmastering sensuality "that can turn everything to ashes, pervert everything"; and he adds that, had he once yielded, as Corrado Silla yields in "Malombra"—for Silla shows us Fogazzaro in his tempestuous youth—his end would have been no less tragic. Our author calls the early novels the novels of temptation. Marina in "Malombra" is obviously little more than the romantic dream of an imaginative youth, whereas Edith "is only the reaction of conscience and religious feeling, born of terror of the pit." Henceforth, however, Fogazzaro drew from life, and we know that "Daniele Cortis" is a faithful picture of his own temptations. Elena, we learn, is a real woman who had lost her faith and whom he endeavoured to convert. The extracts from his note-books and his letters to her show the depth of his love, but the single entry in English, "Friend, not lover. Never," explains everything. For it appears that, like Elena, she actually left Fogazzaro at his own bidding, yielding to the scruples of a faith she did not share, though he never ceased to love her. This mystic friendship with Elena gave Fogazzaro a new life, a manly sense of vigour, of faithfulness, of spiritual youth. Though the next novel, "Il Mistero del Poeta," is certainly his weakest, it is necessary for the understanding of his author. Violet is no longer the temptress, but the heavenly guide, the Beatrice; for to Fogazzaro earthly love is "the beginning of the divine and a path to things eternal." But in order that she might fulfil her mission he has to remove her from the world, just as he put the sea between Daniele and Elena. The man who had loved Marina and Elena could never have found peace even in marriage with Violet.

He belongs to the family of those great, unhappy spirits to whom Christianity, while offering every hope of the future, can bring no peace in the present. He is the last of the Catholic romantics, sickled o'er with that religious melancholy that comes from a heart which must abandon itself completely to the divine will, but which is conscious of the life eternal from having tasted of it. For such tortured spirits earthly happiness is always an unattainable myth. The mystic solution is the only solution, death the one hope, the life beyond the grave the one reality.

For a moment the sensual side of Fogazzaro was at rest, and then every other feeling was soon swallowed up in the great sorrow of his life, the death of his only son. It was in these circumstances, when the whole man was for once in perfect balance, that he wrote "Piccolo Mondo Antico." This is undoubtedly his best book, his one complete artistic success, since the religious and other aspects are all completely merged in the work of art. The scene is laid in his own Valsolda, while Franco is his father and all the other characters are drawn from life. And to our mind it will be read long after novels like "The Saint" or even "Daniele Cortis" are as dead as the problems which loom so large in them. The success was immediate, and soon after its appearance Fogazzaro was made a Senator.

But this peace was not to last. Jeanne Dessalle of "Piccolo Mondo Moderno" is again a real woman. Much younger than Fogazzaro, she fascinated him for a time. She also appears to have appealed to him to give her the faith she did not possess. Maironi, though Fogazzaro expressly declares that he never loved Jeanne, obviously possesses Fogazzaro's own weaknesses, and his creator deliberately endowed him with them. But Sig. Gallarati-Scotti sees that they were a fatal bar to his conceivably becoming a great reforming saint of the Church. The interviews with the Pope and the Ministers ring hopelessly false.

Fogazzaro's relations with the Modernists and his attempts to reconcile science and religion are, of course, fully discussed here. His submission to the Church of the "Saint" has fascinated him for a time. But we are from him not only the Modernists, but the Liberals, who even attempted to have his name removed from the "Consiglio Superiore per la Pubblica Istruzione," while the Clericals refused to believe that it was genuine. But Fogazzaro was a fervent Catholic, if no Clerical. He believed as firmly in the Roman Church as he did in the need for its reform, while he was tolerant of other Christian Churches. To him the religious life meant "charity, life, action." In a document he left behind him he says:

The world cares little about theologies, old or new, or about the authors and writers of the Scriptures, but in a religious man it respects the faith that expresses itself in an elevated morality. . . . The world is Christian at least in this, that it judges the tree by the fruit.

These are the aspects of Fogazzaro with which this biography is largely concerned, for its author is an enthusiastic Modernist, and we confess that it leaves us with a sense of incompleteness. We miss the virility and energy of the man of affairs, the broad sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men that enabled Fogazzaro to people his books with a host of living men and women. Above all we miss the humour, though it flashes out occasionally in Fogazzaro's own letters and notes, and we are expressly told that it did not desert him, even in his last illness, when he re-read several of the novels of his beloved Dickens; and his humour is a quality in which he is as near to Manzoni as in his religion. It is this broadly human side that enables many who have no sympathy with Fogazzaro's ideas to delight in his novels, and Sg. Gallarati-Scotti hardly seems to us to have brought it out sufficiently in his "Life," valuable and profoundly interesting though it undoubtedly is.

THE SCIENCE OF CONSERVATISM

Par A. L. Galeot. (Paris, Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. 15fr.)

TAKE the first two columns in l'Action Française, remove from them all M. Daudet's genius for venomous sarcility, inflame them with the science of sociology until they fill 400 pages—the result is M. Galeot's book on the organization of modern society. And a very interesting result it is for the psychologist and the sociologist. Here is a man who appears sincerely to believe that he is a scientist, that he has arrived at his political beliefs by induction, that he can conclusively demonstrate certain truths about what he calls the "rational-experimental organization of human society." Yet all this tremendous parade and paraphernalia of science and logic and terminology cannot conceal the little seed which has produced this exuberant flowering of philosophy, M. Galeot is a French royalist; M. Galeot is a reader of l'Action Française; M. Galeot dislikes the Socialists. There is the seed of prejudice; the interesting thing is to watch the process by which it flowers into an elaborate scientific system which proves that Liberalism, Democracy, and Socialism are false organic systems of society and produce nothing but material and moral misery, and that the only rational-experimental system, particularly for France, is a monarchy based on the sanctity of private property. A monarchy is the only rational form of human organization because, says M. Galeot, the qualities required in the head of a State are "specialization and continuity." The probabilities are that a hereditary monarch will be better endowed by nature with the qualities necessary for the head of a State than anyone else. In fact, kings are very rarely bad, sometimes excellent, and usually good and wise. Such kings give their countries discipline and peace. Witness the history of France; whenever there has not been a descendant of Hugh Capet at the head of the government there has been nothing but misery, invasions, and disasters. Consider, too, the kings of England, Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania. Even Nicholas II., though he had certain faults, was not as bad as Lenin. And then there rises up before the disciple of M. Daudet the spectacle of Wilhelm II. What is he to say of Wilhelm II., a king and a legitimate king who hated Socialists, Liberals, and Democrats? Well, being a good Frenchman, he has to admit that Wilhelm II., "showed himself morally inferior," but "that is the temperament of the whole German race."

It is difficult to say whether M. Galeot's love of kings or his hatred of Democracy and Socialism is the stronger. They are certainly the twin bases of his rational-experimental system. It is a great pity that he has given his intellect, such as it is, so completely into the hands of his emotional prejudices. Despite the immense output in France and England of books dealing with the State and political and industrial organization, there is still room for a really ruthless investigation of the postulates and axioms of Democracy and Socialism, and a testing of them in the fire of experience. M. Galeot intends his book to be a guide for his fellow-countrymen at a difficult and dangerous point in their history, but his methods are too ill-tempered, confused, and pretentious to be of much assistance.

PREHISTORIC ADVENTURES

IT is all no doubt a little absurd, but not the less pleasant on that account. Our mind was prejudiced unfavourably. This was a story, we gathered, dealing with Primitive Man. A blurred, uneasy recollection arose in our minds, shifting images of primitive man, whole tribes of primitive man and woman, clustering about fires, engaged in primitive occupations, dressed in primitive—but perfectly respectable—furs, carrying primitive weapons; all this with an air at once uneasy and complacent, turtively dashing, ferociously bashing. It was a French film, perhaps an adaptation of one of M. Rosny's books; but certainly it lacked M. Rosny's atmosphere.

On the strength of this recollection, and remembering one or two French scientific romances which had not gripped us, while forgetting, presumably, those which had (Jules Verne's, for instance), we were prepared to exclaim: "The French cannot do this kind of thing. They are too sophisticated. They've not Anglo-Saxons, like Mr. Wells or Jack London; they have not the instinct, the tradition, the—the in a word, the 'je ne sais quoi' of the Anglo-Saxon." Musing somewhat after this fashion, we plunged without more ado into M. Rosny's atmosphere. We made us a spasm a little at first. Within half-a-dozen lines we had been introduced to "Aoûn, fils de l'Urux," and to his friend Zouhr, "fils de la Terre, le dernier des Hommes-sans-Epaules." It seemed unlikely the acquaintance would lead to intimacy.

Still, their friendship, we discovered, had a human quality, and their predilection for the banks of subterranean rivers was pleasantly odd. The last of the Men-without-Shoulders (the Red Dwarfs who massacred the rest of his tribe) was weak-chested and thoughtful, by contemporary standards; Aoûn, son of Nalol (here a false gleam of recognition shone, but faded immediately), was muscular but rather slow-witted. Evidently, they constitute an admirable pair to undertake an adventurous exploration. And upon this they start without delay. By subterranean ways they pass the mountain, which had proved an insurmountable barrier to the nomadic tribe to which they belong. On the further side they discover a country abounding in game and beasts of prey, where they hunt and are hunted with a particularity which would be tiresome, perhaps, if one did not feel that M. Rosny enjoys every word of it.

After many days they reach a chain of rocks beside a river, and discovering a cavern of great residential convenience, they settle there. The cavern or fissure extends quite through the hill, narrowing however before it reaches the opening on the other side. This is an extremely fortunate accident, for beyond the narrow portion is a cave, inhabited by the Félin Géant: they can look at him, but he cannot eat them. And now comes the most charming and original incident in the book. Aoûn and especially Zouhr contrive to bring about a friendship and alliance with the monstrous beast of prey. This sounds preposterous, but it is told very convincingly, with a quality of romance, the romance of human kinship and sympathy with the animal world, which reminds one of the Jungle Books, but is less sentimental.

Their subsequent adventures—contact with friendly and hostile tribes, the capture of Zouhr by the latter, his rescue by Aoûn, how the latter met a party of Amazons and fell in love with one of them, how they were pursued by relentless Dog-Men, and saved by the intervention of the Félin Géant—all this makes good reading, and the book will please throughout those readers to whom a quality of dream-like reality appeals.
Long before the end is reached we have discovered, of course, that it is the Anglo-Saxons who are sophisticated. This narrative is not so clever as the story of the Stone Age which appears in one of Mr. Wells’s collections, or as Jack London’s “Before Adam”; but its profound childlike seriousness and its other qualities give it perhaps a more enduring charm.

List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being defined, in the interest of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, MAGAZINES, &c.

Deedes (Cecil), and others. The Old Town Hall Library of Leicester: a catalogue with introductions, glossary of the names of places, notices of authors, notes and list of missing books. Oxford, printed for the Corporation of Leicester, 1919. 9 in. 252 pp. por., 5/s. 017.1

An exceedingly well-arranged catalogue, printed in clear type on good paper, and valuable equally to the bibliographer and the student for its glossary and notices of authors. From the bibliographical point of view the “get-up” leaves nothing to be desired, and is an example to curators of local collections of ancient MSS. and books.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

This work turns out to be much better than the preface would indicate. We were led to expect a purely academic discussion, but the author quotes his opponents with so obviously honest an attempt to avoid bias that the book becomes, in fact, an unprejudiced account of modern work in metaphysics. We are given a choice, and if we do not always choose the author’s side, it is merely to tribute to his fairness.

The contents of this substantial volume represent an immense amount of labour, and the mass of information garnered by Mr. Spence can be turned to with profit by many persons especially attracted by the out-of-the-way subjects related to the occult “sciences.” Other readers will be interested by such articles as “English Occult Fiction,” “Rosicrucians,” “Psychical Research,” “Necromancy,” and “Astrology.” Some of the illustrations are weirdly fascinating. The brief biographies of Van Helmont, John Dee, Avicenna, Roger Bacon, William Blake, Cagliostro, and numerous others are a prominent and acceptable feature of the Encyclopedia. On p. 335 “Redcliffe” (Mrs. Ann) should be Radcliffe.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Try to think rightly, so as to govern well and produce well, is the lesson of M. Aimel’s sermon. He preaches the cult of national intelligence for the service of national interest. The reforms necessary are intellectual and moral. The many innovations proposed are unworkable, and only constitute vulgar replaitages, unless established upon a fundamental reality. Metaphysics and mysticism must be excluded from the political domain; politics must be treated as a serious affair.

See review, p. 651.

Writers on education have seldom excelled in lightness of touch, and Mr. Lajpat Rai is, we fear, no exception. Apparently, what he desires for India is a system of universal education, in which national ideals, duly modified and modernized, shall play a prominent part. He strongly disapproves of the purdah, and also of the amazing movement for reverting to ancient theories of medicine. “We cannot go back to the traditional methods of bringing our men and women into the world, and then letting them die by hundreds in every thousand, in order to be more truly national.” In a less degree he opposes the revival of Sanskrit, “except for purposes of scholarship.” He lays great stress on the need for school hygiene and physical training. “Hardly one in a hundred graduates of our universities can be confidently said to be possessed of normal health.” The religious difficulty he is inclined to discount. Hindu and Buddhist can attain to essential unity on the broad basis of patriotism, in which loyalty (or terms) to the British Empire is included.

The rise of judicial procedure between States of the American Union; the stability of States by citizens of other States; attempts by citizens of States to bring action against other States by methods of induction; and numerous other themes, are discussed in this learned work by the Professor of Law in Columbia University.

700 FINE ARTS.

*Kimball (Fiske) and Edgell (George Harold). A History of Architecture ("Harper’s Fine Art Series"). New York, Harper (Batsford) [1920]. 8/ in. 646 pp. il. biblog. glossary, index, 18/ n. 720.9

Written and arranged on much the same lines as Banister Fletcher’s well-known handbook, but, as the authors point out, corrected by the results of the study of the monuments carried out by well-trained scholars during the last twenty years, this promises to be among the best introductory works. The illustrations are perhaps not quite so good as those in Banister Fletcher, but they are a still better selection, and it is interesting to find our historians giving very full and serious attention not only to post-Renaissance architecture, but to the work of the moderns, particularly American architects. Mr. Edgell deals with the Middle Ages; the earlier and later chapters are by Mr. Kimball. The German embodiment of Reims laid bare the level crowns of the vaults over the cathedral, an interesting though defective photograph of which shows the structure. A striking merit of the book is the way history and description are made to go hand in hand with the philosophy of the art.
Rowed (Charles). Collecting as a Pastime. Cassell, 1920. 9 in. 148 pp. ill., 7/6 n. 704

See note, p. 634.

780 AMUSEMENTS, GAMES, SPORTS.

The author has been greatly puzzled by that difficult question: What is the correct swing in golf? A professional player, Mr. Ernest Jones, has solved his problem for him, and this book is a detailed account of the solution. There are many photographic illustrations, and it is conceivable that the publication of this book will lower the average golf handicap of the country.

800 LITERATURE.

Art and Letters. Spring, 1920. 9, Duke Street, Adelphi. 9 in. 52 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 805

This number contains, as usual, several good things. The outstanding contributions are three poems by the late Wilfrid Owen, and the story by Miss Katherine Mansfield, "The Man without a Temperament." The last three lines of Wilfrid Owen's sonnet, "The War," we laughed—knowing that better men would come, and greater wars: when every fighter brag

He fights on Death, for lives: not men, for flags, if they have not the imaginative power of certain of his other poems, has a tense force of their own. Miss Mansfield's story is remarkable for the complete success with which she has captured an elusive emotional overtone. We have the sense—so rare in reading English short-stories—of an absolute mastery of the instrument. Its harmonious beauty contrasts rather violently with Mr. Aldous Huxley's exercise in the same genre. The best of the drawings is that by Mr. Wyndham Lewis, "A Woman with a Cat." Mr. T. S. Eliot, in a critical essay, falls heavily upon Professor Gilbert Murray's versions of Euripides.

A selection of Courier's letters written from France and Italy, the "Pétition aux Deux Chambres," the letter to the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, the one to the editor of the Censer, the "Simple Discours," the "Avertissement sur la lettre à M. Renouard," and the preface of the translator of Herodotus, form the text of this well-edited volume.

Miss Farnell thinks the interest in the literature of the Latin races, relatively to that in German literature, will be greatly stimulated as a result of the war, and offers this representative selection to the reader who does not know Spanish. The passages are chosen from Juan Ruiz, arch-priest of Hita, Don Juan Manuel, Francisco Imperial, the Marquis de Santillana, "La Celestina," Garcilaso de la Vega, Luis de Leon, San Juan de la Cruz, Arcegnaola, Lope Felix de Vega Carpio, Rioja, Espinosa, Valera, Ramon de Campoamor, Nunez de Arce, Blasco Ibáñez, Ruben Dario, Martinez Ruiz (Azorin), Machado, Villaespera, and some anonymous works. Historical and critical prefaces and notes enhance the value of the book.

Latour (Louis), ed. French Passages for Reading and Recitation, from Malherbe to Clemenceau. Compiled and annotated by Louis Latour. Methuen [1920]. 8 in. 192 pp. index, 4/6 n. 841.8

These "passages for reading and recitation" are for the most part minute extracts torn violently, according to time-honoured precedent, from their context in play, novel or other work, a few short poems being the only exceptions. We encounter one by one our old acquaintances, De Musset's pelican, Béranger's grand-mere, Athalie's nightmare vision; but the collection is brought up to date by a quotation from a recent speech by M. Clemenceau. The notes contain information on such varying subjects as the reputation of Homer, the style of Livy's History, the characteristics of elves, and—more relevantly—the distinction between a écez and a curate, a vicar and a vicaré.

Moor (T. Sturge). The Powers of the Air. Grant Richards, 1920. 8 in. 77 pp. boards, 6/6 n. 820.1

See review, p. 688.

See review, p. 635.

The Old Testament is such an easy prey that we are surprised that so witty a writer as Mr. Pearsall Smith should waste his time in sniping at it. He writes in the parodied style of the Biblical commentator who glosses the crude text with those sentimental, "psychological" explanations so dear to the heart of that certain class of religious writers. The result is, frankly, a little dull. Personally we prefer the commentators themselves—that unforgettable note, for instance, on wolves in sheep's clothing: "Dean Stanley remarks that the wolves in Palestine are larger and of a greyer colour than those found elsewhere."

POETRY.

Dircks (Helen). Passenger. Chatto & Windus, 1920. 7 in. 71 pp., 5/6 n. 821.9

Miss Dircks can give to simplicity a singular charm. "Changeling": is an example of the way in which she can body forth or propound an interesting psychological truth in words of one syllable:

My dear lover, Who could fail To find you like a changeling In a fairy tale? Sometimes you're a prince And I a beggar-maid, To knead before you, Humble, afraid. Sometimes you're boy, And I a girl with you, To laugh and play The long day through. And sometimes you are—as I like best— My little son Upon my breast.

Earle (May). Acte, a Love Sequence; and other verse. Chapman & Hall, 1920. 7 in. 160 pp., 5/6 n. 821.9

Acte, first loved and then banished by the Emperor Nero, a worshipper of Venus who became a Christian, is the subject of Miss Earle's sequence. Miss Earle writes in a vigorous, highly-coloured, post-Spanish manner, style dashing along as a great pace through thick and thin, putting Pegasus at the highest gates, and not much caring if he knocks off the top two or three bars so long as he gets over somehow.

Picabia (Francis). Unique Euxque. Preface by T. Tzara ("Collection Dada"). Paris, Au Sans Pareil, 1920. 7 in. 68 pp. por. paper, 3fr. 50. 814.9

"Les myriapodes philosophiques ont cassé des jambes de bois ou de metal, et même des ailes, entre les stations Vertu-Realité. Il y avait toujours quelquechose d'insaisissable: La Vie." M. Picabia's poem is an attempt to seize the unsizable, to live "sans prétexte," as M. Tzarz puts it, without philosophy, literary arrangement or any other effort of outward and inward convention of tradition..."Unique Ennuye" is the sort of stuff one writes when one makes the mind a blank, sits quite quiet, and allows the pen to write what it will in a species of automatic writing. It is, if you like, more alive, closer to the vital processes, than the kind of literature that is not automatic, but the product of consciously exercised will and reflection. Personally, we prefer life as it is informed and made significant by thought. It is already a piece of philosophic pretentiousness to express life in words; why not carry the process a short step further and turn it into literature? or, better still, why not refrain altogether from writing?

FICTION.

Doucetault (Ruth Holt). The Rose of Jericho. Putnam, 1920. 8 in. 489 pp., 7/6 n. 813.5

This very long story, set mostly in America, deals with the fortunes of Sheelah Brent, who becomes a successful actress, and retains the keenest affection for her son Michael, although she has a chequered life and more than one adventure in love. Poverty, and relations which end in beggary or separation, are among the themes touched on in this well-filled novel, which holds the reader's attention to the end.

The tale opens at the wedding of Folly Vallance, actress, and Anthony Bond of Saskatchewan. The bridegroom is rich, the bride pretty, and the match is supposed to be for love. Really it is a marriage only in name, owing to Bond's irreligious resentment at a remark made before marriage by the thoughtless but affectionate Folly. Bond's "best man," who is a good fellow, saves the bride from dangerous paths, and is happily in the end. Perhaps the best thing in the story is the portrayal of the irascible old general, with his "dust and ashes" wife.

Fifteen charming little stories, generally dealing with the problem which the author has set himself: Why has the Church failed?" But the Church, he declares, "has not wholly failed," and will "surely reform herself." There will be no more Kikuyu controversies or the like. Withholding the Communion from sick soldiers, and squabbles over the right of preparing soldier-candidates for confirmation, will be matters of ancient history. One of the best stories in the book is "Redemption," telling of a sometime Montana apache who, dying on the battlefield, is ministered to by a priest whom in former days he had robbed and nearly killed.

McCutcheon (George Barr). Shot with Crimson. With illustrations by F. R. Gruger. Jenkins, 1920. 8 in. 165 pp., il., 3/6 n. 813.5

A vigorous spy-story by the author of "Brewer's Millions." Mr. McCutcheon introduces us to the reserved and unsympathetic wife of a patriotic American, consciously unknown to her husband, is a secret-service agent of the late German Government, and is concerned in the engineering of various terrible deeds. She in turn meets her doom. We are becoming rather tired of spy-stories; but this is a good, crisp tale of the sort, not too long, and many readers will like it.

Ostrander (Isabel). The Clue in the Air. Sheffington [1920]. 8 in. 288 pp., 7/6 n. 813.5

Miss Ostrander's new story tells how a girl is murdered by being flung from a high window into the street, and of the tracking-down of the murderer by the Scottish Yard men—or their equivalent in America. Complications are introduced through the discovery that the victim was the wrong girl, and the interest becomes absorbing. The author, indeed, handles her situations so capably that we are held breathless to the conclusion. One of her technical advantages is her power to appreciate the essentials. We have to recognize, however, that it is hard not to write an interesting story when all the primitive passions are in the crucible. Murder, revenge, self-gratification, hatred—Miss Ostrander is lavish with them. But the interest is hardly other than that of the police columns in the lower-grade Sunday newspapers.

See review, p. 851.

The practised author has managed to introduce a new feature into her latest story—a Jewish moneylender and his wife who are noble and lovable characters. Denys Fitzmaurice dreams how he may benefit his neighbours by reclaiming bogs and developing the foreshore, but the people cling to their old life and treat him as an enemy. There are graphic descriptions of an outbreak of typhus and the heroic efforts of doctors and nurses to combat it; and as a relief a charming Irish heroine.

"The Baking of Bertram by War" is the sub-title of the major portion of Wren's story, and might have been a apter title for the book itself. But the whole immemorial process of "baking" as a transvaluer is being examined just now, an increasing number of people having learned how to keep healthy on raw foods. Warfare is the means of baking Bertram Walsingham Greene, who is a poet, and by it he is made a dull-sensed, hardened, practical creature who has suited his earlier repugnance for indelicate things, his horror at the suffering and death of his fellows, and become an adept in the usual army speech—surely an important factor in such "baking"—and unjust and brutal to his inferiors. Finally he loses his sense of ideal love. He is, in short, baked to a turn.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF CRITICISM

A FEW weeks ago I wrote an article in The Athenæum on Craftsmen Critics, and this article has been rather severely handled by one of my friends on the ground that it was nonsense. He has been able to quote several foolish estimates formed by craftsmen, and he has also emphasized one very serious difficulty which lies in the way of the craftsman critic. This difficulty is one of social relationship. The ideal critic has no friends, no prejudices: he is not called upon to meet intimately the persons he has just been criticizing or is about to deal with. He lives remote, in the world, but not of it; full of gusto for life, but outside the vehemence of its partisanship. He is neither in camps nor in dinner parties, and yet is sensitively aware of all productivity and its significance. The suggestion implied is that if I meet an artist (a rare experience), I must be influenced by the personal contact; and that if I work as a craftsman in one or more of the Arts, I cannot escape preference for my own limitations as an executant. There seems to be something to be said for my friend's objections. Let him who is without prejudice among us cast the first stone.

But to return to the exact difficulty. The fact that one ridiculous person or another, who has seen his name upon a dozen title-pages, makes characteristically ridiculous remarks upon another person equally ridiculous, does not invalidate a general theory. And if a craftsman who is also a critic meets at dinner another craftsman who is not a critic, must the first be biased against the second? Ideally, he should not be. In fact, he is not. He is certainly not more likely to be biased than is the critic whose criticism is his only craft. The critic may be influenced by many considerations, but his judgment, which alone matters, since the expression of it is inevitably imperfect, need not be affected. What is far more to the point is that there are certain definite conventions which govern journalistic criticism. The critic who is honest never dreams of thinking (let alone saying): "I do not like this work because I dislike the man who made it." He possibly recognizes in the work characteristic defects which he has observed in the man. He may hear the author's voice, may know the model, may pierce by social knowledge an artistic humbug which would have deceived him as a critic. Need he be unfair? I cannot see why he should be unfair; and yet I have certainly observed that inferior critics use facts gleaned in personal gossip in order to substantiate inferences derived from the work itself. The inclination is not singular to the artist. It is common to all who are overworked and perfunctory.

The defect I observe chiefly in current criticism is an absence of candour; but it is enforced insinuousness, dictated by the policy of those other than the critic. One may not explicitly say in any paper, for example, until he is dead, that a writer is an inefficient writer. One may not name him in condemning the class of work with which he is associated. One may say, "This book is quite definitely the worst book ever written"; but one may not say, "Mr. Swinnerton is a dull and pretentious writer." One may hint, as one does in French conversation; but one may not be outspoken, as one is in English conversation. The work may be condemned; but not the person who did the work. The convention is legal and editorial; but it affects the contributor, who knows that good-breeding must be observed in newspaper columns as in social intercourse. This convention breeds death.

We have all met the writers who beg for our candid opinion; we have all dressed the naked opinion in flowers and found ourselves still unforgiven.
What wonder that we set the social conveniences above ideal truth? We are humane, and humane-ness is a form of cowardice; just as candour is a form of arrogance. But we are humane as human beings, not as craftsmen. I still suggest that the craftsman has a surer sense—a less tramelled intuition—of what quality lies in a work of art than the critic can have who has never discovered for himself, by actual experience, what lies behind the creative act. All that concerns me here is the difficulty—not of perception, but of expression. If we cannot name a man whom we believe to be a bad craftsman, and deal faithfully with him, then criticism is dead. We need not be vituperative, although even vituperation is better than politeness; but we ought to be able to be explicit. In criticism, however, as in everything else, "good form" is the curse. It is plebeian, it is vulgar, it is unforgivable, to be outspoken. One may stab, but one may not strike. The alternative seems to be the silly brawling of the correspondence columns.

Can nothing be done to remedy this? There is one singular convention which bears upon it and which one may see illustrated at the present time. Humaneness is still the cause. It is that beginners and those who are supposed to be relatively unsuccessful receive undue praise, while those who are understood to be popularly established are by way of having their work unduly attacked. Mr. Wells and Mr. Bennett have long been subjected to a guerilla warfare of this kind. Mr. Compton Mackenzie, suspected of too great and too conscious popular success, is being handed malodorous bouquets by the reviewers of his new book. He is being accused of writing for the public, and not for the reviewers. It does not matter at all. It is mimic warfare. Everybody knows that the tone of all the reviews in the world will not now affect Mr. Mackenzie's sales, that it is a sort of joke. With a writer of smaller popularity the case might be different; but reviewers, being on the whole too tolerant, would exercise discretion, and they would never rush to harry even Mr. Mackenzie if they thought their attacks likely to harm him. They are too kind; their editors are too cautious; the convention is too well-established. It is not that they are fellow-craftsmen (although Mr. Mackenzie quotes proudly among his press-extracts remarks made about him by Mr. Hugh Walpole and myself, in order to show that we enviously watch his successes), but that they are reviewers governed by a general and inflexible etiquette. And until that etiquette is broken, until the critic is allowed to say, quite definitely, that the author, or painter, or composer, is incompetent, we shall have stumbling criticism. The knowledge of the critic is not to be estimated by the timidity of his expressed judgment. Otherwise we should be forced to the conclusion that all reviewers were the nincompoops they appear; which would be absurd. The knowledge of the critic lies in what he is capable of finding in the work. It lies in his power to estimate the essential quality of that work, and not in his public verdict upon it.

There is another difficulty arising out of this question. Some reviewers are not content to appear stupid. They are still as discreet, they still accept the convention; but they expose rather their own brilliance than the quality of the work they are essaying. It is a danger. It is unfair to their subject-matter, for in bravura they lose sight of the critic's function, which is aesthetic appraisal. The judgment may be "there or thereabouts"; but there has been a very curious abandonment of an essential faculty. For the sake of what is often true and amusing as objective comment, these critics have denied themselves the exercise of a function incomparably higher and finer. They have suppressed imagination, which is sympathy; and have sought only to display their own skill. It is pardonable; but it is not criticism.

What, then, is criticism? It certainly implies a double process—of subjection to the work of art and of detachment from it. It is, like poetry, emotion remembered in tranquillity. It is for each of us the thing we have made for the preservation of our own self-respect. Art is only one of the aspects of life with which it is concerned. With moral and aesthetic theory we can occupy ourselves for generations; but in the application of improvised moral and aesthetic theory we spend all our thoughts upon life and the arts. Something tells us when a piece of music is sentimental, when a poem is more than a lozenge of words, when a novel is the result of a conception or a recipe. It tells each of us, perhaps, a different thing; but there is not a great deal of difference in estimate, as we may see by the way in which (for example) writers achieve a sort of equilibrium, half-way between the position claimed for them by idolaters and the neglect dictated by the superior spirit. The superior spirit may be anemic and affected; and the idolater may be a fool; but only an inferior artist will be deceived by either, and if he is deceived he will unquestionably fall into insignificance. That is what time does; it waves aside all reviews, good or bad, friendly or indifferent. It is then that quality tells, above all accidents and preciously cultivated tricks of execution and judgment. The leaven of real criticism thus works all the time. The mischief is that it works in spite of printed opinion. It will not be possible for printed opinion to regain (or attain) authority until it becomes the expression of imaginative sympathy; and as imaginative sympathy is a rare and precious gift, to be found at its highest only in the truly creative artist, we must not expect it to penetrate literary criticism at any time. Few of us will take the trouble to comprehend a work of art. Critics either wish to think of brilliant things to say about it, or they remember the author or his successes and failures. They sacrifice a personal imagination to a false regard for opinion or their own dexterity. And in both of these weaknesses they are abetted by editors, who, to a man, dread a tedious sincerity of estimate as much as they dread the law of libel. It is time good form and brilliance were alike discarded in favour of a love of life and art for its own sake. But as long as gentility remains reputable it will not be recognized for the procurer it is.

FRANK SWINNERTON.

Under the auspices of the Egyptian Exploration Society a lecture will be delivered by Professor E. P. Grenfell, D.Litt., at Burlington House, on Friday, May 28, at 8.30 p.m., on "The Present Position of Papyrology."
ARThUR SYMons

To me, as to many another man who remembers the English poetry of twenty and of fifteen years ago, there have befallen certain accidents of memory and oblivion; certain adventures in appreciation and depreciation. I am, I presume, not the only man who has worn dog-eared a volume, one volume or another, of Arthur Symons’ poetry; who has lost or lent it, and even lost or lent a second or a third copy.

There come to me two poems of “the Road,” of the somewhat Borovian or even Stevensonian “Road,” “Gipsies” and “Wanderers,” who had chosen the better part; “Faces of friendly strangers, not the slow monotony of friends”; “decadence,” that is, flying in the face of British wholeheartedness; “the rat gnaws at my heart,” “The Brown Sparrow,” the “Hymn to Immortal Beauty” with its “I am the torch,” she saith, “but where is the moth dare burn?” “I am Isuuld and Helen, I have seen Troy burn and my fondest knight lie dead.” “Time has been the breath upon the glass.” And men have said:

Age after age in rapture or despair
Love’s few poor words, before mine image there.

One remembers a poem in broken lines and by phrases. I am deliberately beginning this essay from memory, and in the surety that there has been no book of Symons on my shelf since some vague period “before the war.”

Yet in the flurry of new values and new poets I wonder how many there are who will leave so many lines, or so many distinct poems, in the faulty memory of the reader in 1940. There were in Symons’ books translations of Verlaine, and there was likewise a poem of Verlaine’s own on the Fountain Court, a poem made for Symons by Verlaine, non sine gloria.

There was also a book, prized above the essays on Siena and the Italian cities; a book seemingly of variations on “Louis Lambert,” “Spiritual Adventures.” It was perhaps the best of the Paterine prose books of the nineties, treating of Degas, of Esther Khan, of some fictitious person (probably in semi-autobiography); all of these making a distinct, a separate flavour in the mind, and, as time proves, a basis of durable memory.

Of the Bensons who were poets in that time I remember nothing distinctly. Dowson has been made distinct by death, and by being compact in one volume; Yeats has continued in the Irish Theatre and in progressive activity. Symons, after severe illness, has reappeared as if still in the land of ’95, writing still of Javanese dancers, and certainly very much “out of the movement,” and, on that account, possibly too much out of our minds when we indulge in the schoolmasterly game of “estimating the period.”

There is a somewhat harsh judgment of Symons registered in the private papers of Lionel Johnson, the man least fitted among men of Symons’ own decade to understand Symons’ particular beauty, for Johnson was entrenched in a very different belief and a very different comprehension of values; yet even at the end of that note of his we find the praise or the compensation: Symons, “a slave to impressionism, whether the impression be precious or no. A London fog, the blurred, tawny lamplights, the red omnibus, the dreary rain, the depressing mud, the glaring ginshop, the slatternly shivering women: three dexterous stanzas, telling you that and nothing more. And in nearly every poem one line or phrase of absolutely pure and fine imagination...he might be of the elect.”

For the generation that was to come after the impressionists these definite things have come to have considerably more meaning and significance than can any general statements of theology, and what impresses one to-day in re-reading Symons’ earlier work is scarcely its dexterity. Indeed, one has difficulty in finding in the earlier books just the poem one wants for an illustration of Symons’ datum. One has, assuredly, the impression of Monet and of Degas, not always incomparably “put on.” Poem after poem strikes one as not quite the thing to convince a younger audience that Symons was, in the nineties, a permanent poet; on the other hand, the early books, after this disappointment in the individual poems, leave one with the aroma or conviction or general sense of having been in contact with a poet, with a poet having really a datum of his own, and one which he declines, on any terms whatsoever, to surrender. This is not because “poetry is something undefinable.”

Granting this slight blur or muzziness, granting it to one’s imaginary opponent in debate, one turns to the translations in the “Knave of Hearts”:

I know that rich and poor and all,
Foolish and wise and priest and lay,
Mean folk and noble, great and small,
High and low, fair and foul, and they
That wear rich clothing on the way,
Being of whatever stock or stem,
And are coffled newly every day,
Death shall take every one of them.

It is Villon, and one’s impression is not of dexterity; it is perhaps nearer Villon than was Swinburne’s magnificence; it has a quality of Villon which is not in Syngue’s inspired renderings. And with all our past ten years’ talk of direct treatment and hard phrasing I do not know that the “next generation” has gone much further toward that desirable plainness of Villon than had Symons. He carries a touch of it even into the verses from Chénier, so that we may lay it, at least in part, to his own later conception of style.

For dexterity, and for the sort of translation that adds and remarkes a poem, we find:

Your soul is a sealed garden, and there go
With masque and bergamasque fair companies
Playing on lutes and dancing and as though
Sad under their fantastic frilleries.

In reading the translations of Verlaine it may come upon one that Symons’ truth was the truth of impressionism, the wisdom Degas’ colour-scheme. Whistler was, after all, wiser than Blake, but one had to see the two exhibitst of these antipodal artists side by side at the Tate Gallery eight years ago, before one ever thought of the antithesis. Verlaine’s time did perhaps find the sky too blue and the sea too green, and for the next fashion neither sea nor sky has colour sufficient. This parenthesis is no part of the argument.
We come next to the Catullus:
Old men’s sayings are for old men wise enough:
Give them a farthing for the price of the stuff.
We find in this rendering of the “Vivamus” a sustained piece of translation, and when one thinks how utterly “untranslatable” Catullus is, we can but wonder if any man, in English, has better succeeded in finding the tone and idiom to render him or his quality:
But thou, Catullus, know that ease
Wrong thee: put off thy idleness.
Older and happier states and kings
Have perished for no less.
Symons in his translations shows himself a master of cadence, and cadence is not dexterity, it is the emotional man. And what we do not know in this country is the value of a new kind of cadence, or a new modus in the sequence of words; though in painting a new pigment would breed a whole crop of essayists, and a new manner of speech is as great a boon (if not a greater) to the intelligence as a new colour among painters. And the “classics” are still rendered by a type language modelled upon “Not only do the Batavians,” and we run so fast after novelty that we cannot take the good things lying to hand.

Poetry

THE NIGHTINGALE

Hark! What has the night to say of love
For love to take unto itself, and brood
And ponder on, until the midnight finds
Love self-creative, shaping in the dark
An immortality of future morning?
The cypress, troubled of the evening wind,
Sighs, swaying unto the east, whence come
The later shadows. Now her boughs are dumb
As with a benediction and a warning,
Looming before the altars of the night,
Eternal monument of sleeping life.

Westward the sickled moon and star are bright,
Waning together, amorous sister-spheres,
Princess and queen of sorrow-burdened tears,
Divided thrones that never shake with strife,
Never with human restlessness.

Hark! Hark!

Now stir the heavy curtains of the dark.
The lush laburnums tremble, odorous music
Floats from the lilac bloom along the lawns, Preferring passionate change from divine silence
To a diviner eloquence.

Afar off, more remote than dawns
Half forgotten, more previous than youth,
Afar off wakes the oracle of night.
Listen, O Love, for the eternal truth,
Behold the blindest vision, darkest light;
See the long, slow glory creeping up,
The wine of life all tumbled in the cup,
Bubbled with careless rapture, glinting rare
With glancing lights from a worldless atmosphere
Whose form is other than an earthly air.
There breathe in changeless time and seasonless year
All things we long for and abandon here,
All joyful things that grieve us till we die,
All loves united which our love-dividing earth
Sunders by barriers of mortal wrongs, sunders with pain, Poverty, blindness of eyes, sickness of birth.

Hark! Hark! In the copse,
From the heart of darkness drops
Piteous sound; sound of the tears
Of the sorrowful yearning of years
Gathering, surging, agony fierce in the night,
Ever unanswer’d, echoless, lost in the silent despair
Of time ever receding, ever at ebb, ever in flight;
Piteous sound, yearning for dreams that are fair
Ebbing with time, outward; dreams that are lost
In the darkness of night, in the whiteness of noon,
In the falsehood and lure of the moon;
Dreams in a limitless host Fading and dying away,
Never at rest;
Locked in the heart of the day,
Beating. . . . beating at the breast
Of the night, when mid silence of life,
Joined with the wail of the vanishing years,
Is heard afar off the din of the soul in its strife;
And the future is dimmed with its fears.

EPITAPHIC

I, to whom now the world has grown too strange,
May turn my meditation, well-content,
Upon the last unmarred completest change,
Once feared, held now the surest mornment.
And so foreboding speechless long repose
That shall receive my spirit after strife,
I hold the gates a moment ere they close,
Pondering how I may say farewell to life—

Shape what conclusion with my latest breath
And wisdom’s ripeness to this end deferred?
By what confession win my shrift of death?
Sum up my love and hatred in what word?

“Here, Life, thy lover thou hast foully slain.”
But should I tell if I had loved thee right?
“Here’s one who sought the life-long day in vain
He knew not what: him overtook the night.”

Or this: “I found the things I did not seek,
And could not love them, for the things I sought.”
—So mustering conclusions vain and weak
To hold the strength and depth of my last thought,

I’ll grant the leave my day-worn heart awaits
And turn in silence from the falling gates.

CELIA AND SYLVIA WAREN

What is that tapping? There it is again!
A spray of roses blown against the pane—
Thorns scratching and a softly-thudding bloom.

It’s strange, as we meop here in this prim room,
Yawning for bedtime in the cold lamplight,
To think of roses blowing in the night,
And just that thin glass shutting them outside,
Oh, how I long to fill the window wide!

Roses and thorns!

Ayi, thorns too, if need be!
Rather than hear them tap incessantly
The cold glass that shuts in my heart, I’d bare
My bosom for the sharpest thorns to tear.

REVIEW

THE POWER OF WORDS

The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma. By Henry Adams. (Macmillan, 15s. net.)

It is unfortunate that there are such a limited number of words in the English language. As a result the reader not only has too few words to indicate the objects of his thought, but he is in danger of becoming confused from the fact that most words possess more than one content. For this reason the mathematical logicians have dispensed with words as far as possible, and use instead very carefully defined symbols. The result sometimes looks a little comic, but after reading the writings of Henry Adams we wish the practice were universal. Failure to distinguish between the different meanings a word may have is more marked, of course, with some people than with others, but it can seldom have been more complete than it was with Henry Adams. He belonged to a distinguished family—his grandfather was President of the United States—and he himself manifested grand ideas of action, and other (a descriptive "systems," and, being a child of his age, he saw that such systems must be based on the discoveries of science and must be built on "scientific" lines. His peculiar ability to use an ambiguous term, intending all its meanings simultaneously, enabled him to construct such a system. A criticism of his writings is really a criticism of his employment of certain key-words. From such an examination we can construct his mental processes. His mind seems to have worked in such some fashion as the following.

In the course of his reading he found that some scientific generalization, such as the second law of thermodynamics, has a practical application. The system—producing part of his mind seized on this, and he began to dream of some vague but impressive universal application. His excitement increased until everything, whether it be in the heavens above or in the earth beneath, existed solely as an example of the second law of thermodynamics. A careful scrutiny of his remarks gives us no reason to suppose that he ever understood this law. That was not, perhaps, necessary for his purposes; it was the "broad outline" he wanted, the vaguer the better. The passage from this emotional state to the actual construction of a system was easy; in virtue of his peculiar attitude towards words, he selected a number of suitable words—suitable because besides their precise scientific meanings they had a number of indefinite, more general meanings—and proceeded to use them in all senses at once.

We have, for example, such words as energy, intensity, tension, degradation and so on—purely technical words. But these words, in all sorts of different meanings, are also employed in common speech. Now, various scientific "laws" state that between the scientific meanings of these words certain relations are invariable. This was enough for Henry Adams, and he proceeded to state that between any meanings of these words the same relations are invariable. The effect of this method upon the reader is very curious. He is continually in the state of a man who has a name "on the tip of his tongue." One is always just on the point of attaching a meaning to Henry Adams' remarks, and the meaning always eludes one. This peculiar quality, and at the same time the essentials of Henry Adams' "system," can best be exhibited in the following quotation:

The processes of History being irreversible, the action of Pressure can exist only in one direction, and therefore the variable called Pressure in physics has its equivalent in the Attraction which, in the historical rule of phase, gives to human society its forward movement. Thus in the historical formula, Attraction is equivalent to Pressure, and takes its place.

In physics, the second important variable is Temperature. Always a certain temperature must coincide with a certain pressure before the critical point of change in phase can be reached. In history, and possibly wherever the movement is one of translation in a medium, the Temperature is a result of acceleration, or its equivalent, and in the Rule of historical phase Acceleration takes its place.

The third important variable in the physico-chemical phase is Volume, and it reappears in the historical phase unchanged. Under the Rule of Phase, therefore, man's Thought, considered as a volume, passes through a series of phases. In each of these phases is assumed to follow the analogy of water, and to pass from one phase to another through a series of critical points which are determined by the three factors Attraction, Acceleration and Volume, for each change of equilibrium.

The "scientific" basis of his system consists, it will be seen, in Gibbs' phase rule and a miscalculation of the kinetic theory of gases. The rest is done by confounding the meanings of words, or even by depriving them of meaning. In science, for instance, the "attractions." Henry Adams read about always varied inversely as the square of the distance. It was interesting to watch how he would bring this in. It appears on p. 291:

Throughout these three hundred years, and especially in the nineteenth century, the acceleration of thought suggests at once the old, familiar law of squares. The curve resembles that of the vaporization of water. The resemblance is too close to be disregarded, for nature loves the logarithm, and perpetually recurs to her inverse square.

The inverse square of what? Of the distance of thought? Its distance from what? And which logarithm does nature love? The logarithm of 2? And he refers to a "curve." What were his units? What could have been his units?

After this it is not astonishing to learn that, under the indefatigable influence of the inverse square of nothing in particular, Thought may reach the limit of its possibilities in the year 1921. At this point a question occurs to us: what will happen to comets in 1921? The question may seem irrelevant to one who has not read Henry Adams, but it is suggested by the following passage from the same essay:

The nearest analogy would be that of a comet, not so much because it betrays marked phases, as because it resembles Thought in certain respects, since in the past place, no one knows what it is, which is also true of Thought, and it seems in some cases to be immaterial, passing in a few hours from the cold of space to actual contact with the sun at a temperature some two thousand times that of incandescent iron, and so back to the cold of space, without apparent harm, while its tail sweeps round an inconceivable circle with almost the speed of thought—certainly the speed of light—and its body may show no nucleus at all. If not a Thought, the comet is a sort of brother of Thought.... If such elements are subject to the so-called law of gravitation, no good reason can exist for denying gravitation to the mind.

It will be seen that our query is relevant. The passage is, we admit, difficult. It seems to suggest that there are Thoughts, or the tails of Thoughts, which sweep round "inconceivable circles" and "may show no nucleus at all."

We are inclined to believe that such Thoughts do, in fact, exist.

RURAL ENGLAND

Grain and Chaff from an English Manor. By Arthur H. Savory. (Oxford, Blackwell. 21s. net.)

THERE is only one "Selborne"; but a little of its original virtue is enough to keep a book fresh and sweet for years. And as with the process of "civilization" that virtue becomes ever rarer in our daily lives, we treasure the little that is given to us in the pages of modern books as a soothing balm, an anodyne. Mr. Savory's book is one to keep on a cool shelf with a bowl of pomanders close by Mr. Warde Fowler's "Kingham Old and New" and Mr. Cecil Torr's "Small Talk at Wrexall," for like them, it is the slow fruit of a lifetime's familiarity with the English countryside.

Mr. Savory's manor was Aldington, in Worcestershire, in the rich vale of Evesham, where in a fat year the plums of a careless orchardist will strip the tree of twigs and branches by their own sheer weight, where the land is so heavy that the long wooden wheelless plough with a pear-tree mould-board is still the best implement. No wonder that in this blessed land, where a scholar might almost farm by the "Georgics," Mr. Savory should have been persuaded that his manor gave its name to the Antonia flaeus that Ostorius fortified. Were there not on his land the evident signs of a flourishing Roman-British township, with one of the earliest consular designs to Gratian? Was not Aldington always spoken of as Aventon, and written Anton in the constable's records in the early 16th century? We do not know what the experts will say to it all, nor do we greatly care; Mr. Savory's evidence is good enough for us.

Into his pages he has put with a genial discursiveness all the knowledge brought him by long experience. It is the only knowledge that has a lasting flavour. He marshes us with time-honoured turns of speech, quaint characters, anecdotes with a tang to them, pungent proverbs. We can but choose a few to show their quality. Mr. Savory quotes as an instance of the peasant's habit of understatement an incident to which, strangely enough, we have an exact parallel in our own experience:

To a nephew of mine who was surprised to see his gardener's little son leaving the garden, the man explained: "That little fellow be come to tell I a mididdlin bit o' news: 'e come to say as his little sister be de-ad."

Our own story concerns the cowman on an Oxford farm who drowned himself at dawn. There was no discoverable cause for the suicide. A friend being asked what he thought about it, replied after careful thought: "Well, I reckon that was a pretty middlin affair."

Mr. Savory notes other curious uses of language, They connect the word "friend" with the signification "benefactor" only; a man, speaking of someone born with a little inherited fortune, said that "his friends lived before him." I told an old labourer that my little daughter considered him a great friend of hers. He looked puzzled, and replied: "Well, I don't know as I ever gave her anything." They still distinguish between two words now carrying the same meaning. I told a man that I was afraid some work he had for me would give him a lot of trouble. He corrected me: "Twill be no trouble, master, only labour."

A splendid Dogberryism is that of the old man who said Mr. Savory with an omniscient, then newly invented, and said to him: "I didn't know as you'd got a philosopher" (velocipede: philosopher). Of exceptionally vivid speech there are few examples; but this is good from a man giving thanks for a Christmas present of beef:

"It ain't like that sort of biff we folks has to put up with, that tough you has to sit in the middle of the room at dinner for fear you might dash your brains out agen the wall a-tuggin' at it with your teeth."

But birds and beasts, and trees and flowers rightly hold as large a space in the book as mere humans, though what the author has written about them does not so largely lend itself to quotation; and there are a thousand odds and ends of satisfying knowledge to be gleaned from it, a thousand aids to answering the eternal question: Quid faciat letas segetes? And above all the book is sun-warmed and apple-scented, fragrant with a deep love of the English countryside which inspires this charming apostrophe:

Steady, go steady past these woods; see the blue haze of wild hyacinths, the cool carpet of primroses. Look at the cowslips yellowing that meadow; do you see the horon standing patiently in the marsh? Look overhead, watch the hovering hawk; hack! there! The nightingale. Stop a moment at the bridge; can you see the spredled beauties with their heads upstream? Thank God for the blue, blue sky! Thank God for the glory of the sun, for the lights and shadows beneath the trees! Thank God for the life that lives with us, and for the fragrance and the beauty! Thank God for rural England!

There is, indeed, nothing left for us but to go and live in it.

THE STORIES OF JULES LEMAITRE

Serenus. By Jules Lemaitre. Translated by A. W. Evans. (Selwyn & Blount. 7s. 6d. net.)

Even of literature it is true that we learn and pass on. There is literature which presents life in a way that is inadequate to the premises of that literature; the author fails to understand his material. There is literature which is almost pure entertainment: such a literature has alternate periods of life and death because the taste in amusement is as variable as the fashion in clothes. These stories by Jules Lemaitre belong to both these categories. We are forced to allude here to that King Charles' head of modern critics—Anton Tchekhov. His importance to the critic is that he has shown how far it is possible for the artist to exhibit understanding of his material within the short-story form.

In "Serenus," a story of the Early Christian Church, Lemaitre describes a sceptical, kindly Roman patrician who associates with Christians because he admires their simple goodness and because his dearly loved sister is a convert. By an accident of circumstance, he is condemned to the death of a Christian martyr. He poisons himself, and concealed on his body is a manuscript explaining his sceptical, kindly position. The rest is the indulgent French irony with which Anatole France has made us familiar. The manuscript never becomes public—the few who read it think it better, on the whole, to keep silent—and the rational, clear-headed, scientific, unbelieving Roman goes down to history as a saint. He becomes finally a famous saint, and the grossest superstitions cluster round his name. Lemaitre makes his point excellently by copying out some of the more absurd Christian miracles from the collection of Bernardus Scholasticus and attributing them to his saint. It is a neat point: the thing is quite possible, for certainly the beliefs of Christians in the Middle Ages were very ridiculous. And it is amusing to think of the sceptical patrician giving rise to some of those absurd beliefs. The irony is justified. But it is a point of view we have assimilated. This peculiarly French compound of the discerning eye and the melting heart strikes us now as, if not merely insincere, then just a trifle fatuous. The discerning eye does not seem to us so very discerning, and in the next story, "Myrrha," we have our doubts about the quality of the melting heart. It is the story of a young Christian virgin in love with the Emperor Nero, and persuading herself that her sexual emotions are inspired by a desire to serve God. The theme is treated with aredux of sympathy.

The other stories are agreeably entertaining; but the volume as a whole has chiefly interested us as proving that we really have learned something since the days when the French were our literary exemplars.
HAVING offended an incarnation of Siva, the gods lost their power, and asked Vishnu how they could regain it. He advised them to churn the ocean of milk until the nectar of immortality was formed, and to ally themselves for this purpose with the demons. They obeyed him. The churning stick was a mountain on the top of which Vishnu sat as a balance. He also lay underneath the mountain as a tortoise, and as Krishna raised the gods and demons at the tail of a serpent which served as a churning rope, and which was more or less himself. The head spat fire at the demons, but the tail refreshed the gods by clouds of spray. It would take too long to record the various objects which presently rose from the milk: they included a cow, the goddess of intoxication, a fruit tree, nympha, and the moon, also poison, which last Siva swallowed, to save the other gods. Finally, the nectar of immortality appeared. The demons snatched it, but a lady, really Vishnu, deluded them and won it back.

If we contrast such a legend with the Nibelungs' Ring, which also deals with loss of power, a liquid and a demonic alliance, we may gain some notion, not indeed of Hinduism, but of the problems that Hinduism sets its art. More unstable than water, the legend is as unstable as milk; milk, butter, buttermilk, gods and mountains, snakes and milk, pass into and out of one another, until we lose all sense of individuality. Once inside the churn, anyone becomes everyone or anything. Vishnu is bound to no form or sex. Siva, wroth with the gods, tries simultaneously to save them. And in other legends Siva can be Vishnu, and both of them can be Brahma, and Brahma either of them; for not only is matter a veil that hides reality, but the meshes of the veil are themselves interchangeable. Consequently, the Indian artist has an unusual task before him. Confined as he is to the gross mediums of paint or stone, he cannot hope to attain the reality that lies behind appearances; only the yogin, the yogini, the higher grade of his art, can do that. But he can express the superficial churning, the changes, the interchangeableness, and this is what his religion has asked him to do. In his most typical achievements (e.g., the Kailasa Cave at Ellora or the temples of Khajuraho) he has covered vast surfaces with seething blobs of figures which indifferently beckon to each other, to the architecture, and to the visitor, until all the universe reds and codsices. Isolate these figures in museums, photograph or frame them, and you will get a result that is often interesting and sometimes beautiful, but you will be telling Vishnu that he is Vishnu and nothing else, and Siva that he cannot both create and destroy; you will be misapprehending the basis of Indian Art. This explains and justifies the curious "foreword" that Messrs. Chatterjee affix to their interesting Picture Albums. They request their public "not to be guided or misguided by the names and descriptions of the pictures, but to rename them if better ones occur to them." The Westerner smiles, yet from the Hindu point of view the foreword is legitimate, for Botticelli's Venus may be the Moses of Michelangelo really. And Mr. Havell, who has studied the Hindu point of view so enthusiastically, makes a similar appeal: he entreats us to abandon our individualistic formulae and the academic rules that we have derived from the practice of Rome and Greece, and to approach Indian Art without prejudice and through its only portal—Indian religion. He would even have us believe that art existed before artists, and that in Vedic times, when rishis were frequent and devas sat at human feasts, all the achievements of future ages existed in the form of thought. Was this so? The present reviewer, incurably tepid on the subject of a Golden Age, feels it wasn't. But the question may be left for historians. Mr. Havell is a sound enough guide to the present. His books, though their arrangement is confused and their tone polemical, are the best interpretation of Indian Art that has yet appeared, because they have a profound knowledge of Indian religions. The more one reads him the better one understands.

To understand is not to love, and Indian Art, like Indian cookery, too often leaves a lugubrious taste behind it. We shall never really swallow that ocean of milk. Mr. Havell looks at his pictures; he tends to our limitations than he admits, and with innocent grace he sometimes comes forward with more acceptable dainties, and when we have enjoyed them exclaims, "Now that was Indian!" For instance, he quotes from Rodin that "The test of good art is that the eye shall be perfectly satisfied." How relieved one is to read this statement! Yet how it conflicts with the tests that Mr. Havell applies elsewhere! for his thesis is that art should satisfy not the eye, but the soul—that through the senses it should stimulate something that annihilates sense. Again, he is prompt to point out instances of naturalism in Indian Art, because he knows they will soothe us, or to compare one sculptor with Pheidias and another with the Florentines, because this too in no way affects the sense. Yet naturalism and the West are by definition his foes. Moreover, his photographs—how cunningly he chooses them, how he presents as isolated objects figures that are really part of some architectural whirl! The frontispiece of the goddess Parvati, the sunlit horse in the Temple of Vellore—they are so beautiful, but seen in position they would surely produce a different effect; they would beckon and melt, and they would tend to be anything and everything, and so, from the narrow Western standpoint, nothing. The truth is that, though usually running with the hare, Mr. Havell sometimes joins the hounds for a few strides. His main, and surely his soundest, argument is that Indian Art is different from European. But when an opportunity offers he will also argue that it can beat Europe at its own job, so the reader must be on the alert accordingly.

These are the humours of propaganda. But when one thinks of Mr. Havell's career and of the splendid work he has done against officialism and self-righteousness, both in India and England, one's caution vanishes, and a warm gratitude takes its place. Few men have done more to open spiritual India to us. Even if some of his claims fail, much remains. The South Indian statuette of the Dancing Siva (p. 78) is an exhilarating masterpiece that finds no parallel in the West. Religion for a moment is at one with beauty, and the god, from the tips of his four arms to the tip of his extended left toe, is himself a whirl, a vital fury, a creative fire.

The "Ode to the West Wind," remarks Mr. Havell, "expresses perfectly the whole idea of Yoga in art." It is more important to us that Yoga in art should express the "Ode to the West Wind," and perhaps it comes near to doing it in the statue of the Dancing Siva.

As for the Chatterjee Picture Albums of Modern Art, they are pleasant enough, but so miscellaneous in content that it is difficult to describe them, and they neither challenge nor develop the art of the past. Many of the artists seek inspiration from Indian masterpieces, especially from the Ajanta frescoes, but other influences press in—the American book-illustration, the commercial quaintness of Japan, the shameless sentimentality of our own Royal Academy—so that the outcome is not specifically Indian. One feels that the religious impulse is weakening, and that the art weakens with it. Abanindranath Tagore and Mocholam, the most interesting of the artists represented, may still believe in the Churning of the Ocean with one side of their heads; but they certainly believe in submarines with the other.

THE LORD HARRY

Henry V. By R. B. Mowat, (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

They say that in the fifteenth century the Middle Age went mad and mocked itself before it died. The grey austerity of the Gothic in which six generations of men had glorified God by the chill, stern magnificence of their tall cathedrals wrought into the rococo convolutions of the Flamboyant manner until it blossomed into that strange flower of medieval decadence, the Sainte Chapelle. Manners took on that air of conscious archaisms which always marks the end of an age. Priests became more priestly, maidens fatter more maidishly, and knights bore themselves more knightly than they had ever been seen in the real world of priests, knights and maidens, and the whole generation clung to the ways of its fathers with the desperation of men who see clearly that their sons will take a different road. It is not surprising that there was born into this world of deliberate medievalism and self-conscious chivalry a king whose whole career typified to the point of travesty the royal life of the Middle Ages. Henry V., in whom a hasty posterity has sometimes overrated to see a handy summary of the medieval monarchs, was in reality an ingenious reconstruction of his predecessors in the heroic age. But then Posterity, poor dear, is so American: she loves epitomes, and the temptation to take Henry II., Edward III., Philip Augustus, and several Dukes of Burgundy all in one by getting up King Henry V. has proved too strong for her. He is, to say truth, a somewhat dubious antique. One feels all the time that he has been subjected to a drastic process of restoration. The colours have been brightened and the worms holes have been deepened. His chivalry was so much more chivalrous, his Round Table so infinitely rounder, and his castles so far more castellated than the real thing that one may walk admiringly round him as though he were a medieval masterpiece of that art of architectural reconstruction with which the ingenious M. Viollet-le-Duc delighted the contemporaries of Napoleon III.

This king, if one may adopt the language of the sale-room was Sheraton at best; and his misfortune is that he is generally sold as Chippendale. But his career, if one is free from these antiquarian scruples, forms an excellent subject for biography. After all, he lived a long time ago 1415 was not the day before yesterday, even if it seemed at the heart of the Middle Ages. Knights were very sufficiently bold then, in spite of the disturbing element introduced into the gentlemanly pastime of war by the grimy innovation of artillery; and Mr. Mowat, who has a wide range of mediaval knowledge, finds in the King’s career an admirable foundation for a creditable piece of sound historical writing. One begins with a fine confused picture of England when Henry IV., was engaged in making it, and his aristocracy was (like Penelope) unmaking it when his back was turned. One passes to the Shakespearean controversy as to the reality of the artists represented of comic relief whilst mild-eyed historians hit like maiden aunts over the naughtiness of princes. Mr. Mowat handles this part of his problem with skill and dignity, and when he gets Henry on the throne, his narrative takes a broader sweep and becomes a really valuable text-book of Anglo-French history between 1418 and 1422.

Prince Hal (one falls inevitably into the dialect) had a birthplace which was one of those periodical concessions which the British monarchy makes to Welsh susceptibilities. He was born at Monmouth on the Welsh border in one of those fortresses which were erected by English civilization to dam back the eastward-setting tide of Celtic barbarism, and it does infinite credit to the capacity of Welsh tradition that he has been greeted in these circumstances as a Welsh hero. Early, perhaps too early, he went to Oxford, since the age of eleven seems unduly tender for an undergraduate, even after one has made allowance for the morbid precocity invariably displayed by heirs to the British throne. But as his residence was limited to a period of six months, the Oxford influence on his formation was of the slightest, and time was even wanting for the resident preceptors to proclaim those indications of exceptional ability which they have never failed to detect in the sons of the very great. The remainder of his education (it was conducted in a bishop’s house, and the school-bills included eightpennyworth of harp-strings, a fourpenny work on grammar, and a new scabbard) would appear to have been confined to instruction in the colour of the Middle Ages.

His real training began when his father sent him to govern the Crown colony of Wales. Owen Glendower, who was (like most national heroes from Pym to Robespierre) a lawyer, had raised the country behind the English garrison. He possessed the rare accomplishment of making snow in America and his Welsh enemies enjoyed the more substantial assistance of the French, who operated from the coast, and exhibited in the interests of the Welsh that burning sympathy with small nationalities which is always experienced by the enemies of large nations. This war, and the succeeding period of feudal confusion which resulted in the elimination of the Percies from the governing class, provided Prince Henry with his education in military statesmanship; and when he inherited the throne, he took with avidity to that recognized form of sport, a war with the French, which provided the Kings of England with an appropriate and dignified pastime before the public spirited institution of Newmarket Heath by King Charles II.

If Mr. Mowat has a fault, it is that he is a trifle inclined as a military historian to exaggerate the intelligence of medieval warfare. Strategy in the Middle Ages was an affair of mere collision. If a malicious fate brought the vaguely roaming armies in contact, there was a battle, and the ingenuity of generations of historians would be exercised in attributing to the respective commanders a depth and a precision of military design of which they were profoundly innocent. If, however, the collision was averted by some stroke of luck or loot, there was no battle, and the campaign is reduced in the text-books to the rank of a mere raid. The exercise of writing military history upon these terms is all very well, and one has an art that has brought merited fame, ennoblement, and a seat in the present House of Commons to Sir Charles Oman, we must not deny to Mr. Mowat, who is a young historian, this opportunity to place his foot upon the rungs of the professional ladder.

With the historical problem presented by Prince Henry as vivere he is even more satisfactory than when he attempts an apology for his persecution of the Lollards. One finds it somehow difficult to see this cross between Haroun-al-Raschid and St. Louis presiding at the burning of the heretic Badby, and the fact that the prince interrupted the ante-diluvian in order to offer a half-charred man a perspicacity of one and nineteen a week for the sale of his soul cannot leave as favourable an impression on all minds as it has on that of Mr. Mowat.

P. G.
Those who are acquainted with the works on the English language already published by Professor Wyld will not be surprised to find that his phonetic interest predominates in his new book. It may be described, in one way, as a documented history of English pronunciation from Chaucer to the present day; in another, as an attempt to show that, “during the last two centuries at least, the modifications which have come about in the spoken language are the result of the influence not primarily of Regional, but of Class Dialects,” the final result being the “Public School English” which is now the normal spoken idiom of the educated classes. The author has deliberately omitted any consideration of the vocabulary and of the semantic aspects of language—omissions which, though justifiable from the phonetician’s point of view, seem to leave the book somewhat top-sided and of utilitarian interest for the lay reader who is as a rule less concerned with the sounds of words than with their psychological history. The absence of an index is also a very serious drawback in a book of this class, containing such a vast amount of learned and detailed information. In fact, it is so full of matter that it is bound to be used largely for reference rather than continuous reading, which makes the lack of an index all the more vexatious.

In Chapter I, the author surveys in broad outline the various problems dealt with in minute detail later in the book. The current accepted language is defined as “Received Standard English,” having Provincial or Regional variants which Professor Wyld calls “Modified Standard.” These conditions are, as a result, the most important of which will occur at once to the mind of anyone who reflects for a moment, are indicated by the author with completeness and precision. As the London dialect was formed from three distinct “Regional Dialects,” we find the most curious inconsistencies in its phonology. Thus one Old English sound ([y]) is represented by three distinct modern vowels, e.g., by kiss, sin, bridge; bundle, thrush, caged; hedge, knoll, merry, this apparently haphazard distribution being, in Professor Wyld’s opinion, possibly due to the operation of “Class Dialects.” This would be difficult to establish, but, in the simpler case of the pronunciation of [ar]-the influence of “Class” can be clearly discerned at work. Instances of the change of this sound to [ar]-are very rare before the fifteenth century, but from the sixteenth century onward the [ar]-sound is normal; and the author tells us that about the end of the sixteenth century larn’d was probably the educated pronunciation of “learn’d,” while, according to Leigh Hunt, Kemble (d. 1823) pronounced -ar- in virtue. In the nineteenth century the extension of a superficial education led the finical to substitute a “spelling pronunciation,” with the result that, but for a few words (clerk, Derby, etc.), the -ar- sound has been restored, except in cases where the spelling itself had been definitely altered, as in dark. And here it may be remarked that Professor Wyld would have found valuable material for his book in the study of our surnames (e.g., Clark, Darby, Earned, Merchant, Barclay, Harvard, etc.), which, with all their eccentricities, are as a rule much nearer to phonetic accuracy than the ordinary vocabulary.

Chapter II, dealing with “Dialect Types in Middle English, and their Survival in the Modern Period,” contains an elaborate phonetic description of the three main contributory dialects, followed by specimens of London documents ranging from William I’s charter to Chaucer, in which the characteristic sounds are traced in detail. With Chapter III, we come to the fifteenth century—that period so desolate in literature, but the most fascinating for the student of modern English and its origins. It is here that we first find accessible in any quantity the everyday language as recorded by people of all classes in letters, wills, business documents, gold records, municipal regulations, etc. It is in such documents that Professor Wyld studies those “occasional spellings” the importance of which was first recognized by Professor Harjord, and which give valuable clues to the pronunciation which is not indicated by the more or less traditional spelling of the professional scribe. Great is the debt of the learned to those antiquarian societies which supply them with a continuous stream of texts, mostly without literary interest, but gold-mines for the student of the past, whether his hobby be life or language. These documents fill the gap between the (for the layman) unintelligible speech of Chaucer and the practically modern English of Skelton.

Chapter IV, on “from Henry VIII. to James I.,” shows us the English language arriving at the self-conscious period, when style and vocabulary are criticized, the “court language” is recommended, and pronunciation becomes the subject of discussion for the educated. The “Received Standard English” of the period was, in a way, the creation of those gallant gentlemen who were equally at home in the field, at court, on the deck of a ship, or at the Mermaid tavern. Fortunately they wrote familiar letters as well as sonnets, and, more fortunately still, they had less cultivated contemporaries, such as that rather vulgar coxcomb, Henry Machyn, whose Diary, as Professor Wyld well says, “is of priceless value in that it enshrines, not a counterfeit presentment, such as we might find in comedies, of lower-class speech, but the genuine thing, naturally and unconsciously set down by a man who is obviously putting his own spoken English on paper. Machyn’s vacillation between the words andolvaske (wool-sack), his Amant courte, Alabacco, harth (earth) and Hamurrose, suggest just the kind of venerable coxcomb whom some of us can still vaguely remember.

With Chapter V, “Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries,” we are on modern ground, though it is pointed out that Swift, so intolerant of inaccuracy in others, rhymes ferment with remit, the latter of which he probably pronounced warrant, if not varmint. The literary language was now more or less crystallized, but Professor Wyld finds rich material for his theme in less formal linguistic documents, such as the Vernon Memoirs, Dr. Baillie’s Correspondence and the Wentworth Papers. Moreover, Regional Dialect having almost ceased to influence the written language, the investigator can now go much further afield for his treasure. To this period belong also the early phonetic theorists, from Gill, who published his “Logonomia” in 1621, to Walker, whose “Pronouncing Dictionary” appeared in 1791. Nor must we forget Dr. Johnson, who, in the grammar prefixed to his Dictionary (1755), tells us that “for pronunciation the best general rule is, to consider those the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words”; to which Lord Chesterfield replies, in the World, that “we have at present two very different orthographies, the pedantic, and the omitting all passages in his letters which dealt with religion and the higher emotions"—rather a remarkable omission, we must confess.

Here, at all events, is the last memorial of what might have been. That thin, keen face with its bright red hair and (in the Dardanelles) its bright red "Captain Kettle" beard no longer scrutinizes rather intolerantly less fortunate and less gifted fellow-men. Patrick Shaw-Stewart—and one feels it the more keenly the more one realizes all that lay beneath—is a little unfortunate in having all his young intolerance laid bare to the world without the mitigation of a personal appeal or of a justifying maturity. For he was intolerant, and so were they all, those Eton and Balliol young men, not only of less bright intellects, but of less bright lives. They abhorred the humdrum, the workaday, the common prejudices and enthusiasms. From Oxford he wrote of an Old Etonian dinner:

I don't think Balliol were very popular at the function—they sat together very distinctively in a corner which they had secured beforehand, and were as usual arrogant, noisy, and uncompromising.

To appreciate these words quite exactly implies a knowledge of some finer shades, but they repel at first sight, as other things of the kind repel; his record, for instance, how glibly he voyaged to America, aged 26, not knowing "one soul on board, thank God! Such a collection of funny and frumps, you never did see." Of Rupert Brooke's death he wrote: "He was a very jolly man, and I was sad about it." This might seem feeble comment, but it is esoteric. The world made of those young lions was divided into very jolly men and others: the former were very few. But it is clear that he realized the forthcoming, for on another occasion he wrote of Rupert Brooke:

I think he had drawn in his horns and abandoned his insolence (as some others of us have tried to do) for the war, in order to live happily with queer hotch-potch brother officers.

Well, Heaven knows we all have our petty intolerances, and very poor they would look in print. The point is that, if Shaw-Stewart had lived, they would have fallen into their proper place in the complete picture, and our own age, it must be remembered, has become intolerant of a social intolerance which less than a hundred years ago was accepted as right and proper. Shaw-Stewart, it is clear, had his definition of his own social and political tastes, and it was that which made him so much disliked by the uncomfortable, the common and the sordid. Having swept the board at Eton and Balliol with consummate ease, he did not choose any of the usual narrow channels through which clever boys, with many pains and disappointments, struggle to success. Having already become absorbed in the pleasures of what is generally called "high society," which he set out to conquering, rather, as Father Knox suggests, like a condottiere, he plunged for money. Wanting success before self-expression, he entered Baring Brothers, and it is not difficult to imagine the use he might eventually have made of three powerful levies, remarkable intelligence, money and social influence. He died gallantly, a leader of men, and of such waste who can speak sadly enough? What lay behind his mask can be seen in his letters on the deaths of Charles Lister, Julian Grenfell, Foss Prior, and Raymond Asquith. His poem, already published, which begins proves that he had a soul, and there is ample evidence here, particularly in letters to his old nurse, that there was room in it for warm common affections. With great qualities, he had it in his power to live greatly in great places. He might have learned at last what greatness meant, and have seen that "jolliness" was but a part of it. Yet perhaps he was happy in his death; for the "jolly" world had passed away, and who can say if it will ever return?

I saw a man this morning
Who did not wish to die.

A JAPANESE NOVEL

An Adopted Husband. Translated from the Japanese of Futabatei by B. Mitsui and Gregg M. Sinclair. (Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. net.)

The introduction to this charming novel seems to have been written with the express purpose of assuring us that it is a very serious work of art and that, whatever absurd eggshell notions we may have of life in Japan, they will be broken for ever by this presentation of modern Japanese domesticity. It is even suggested that the problem stated is not by any means unlike one of our own. There is at any rate a jealous wife, a weak husband, an annoying mother-in-law, a stupid servant, and a very gentle lovely girl who is the wife's sister and, fatally for her own and the husband's peace of mind, lives with this family. But there, it seems to us, the resemblance ends—if it has ever really existed. For the persons of the story are caught in the delicate net that is flung over their lives and are only seen through its meshes. Their loves, their sufferings, their jealousy and their anger are all somehow exquisite, touched with fairy, and wonderfully, beautifully remote from the commonplace complications of our London and provincial novelists. Consider, for instance, Tetsuya, coming home from his lecturing at the University and being met by his sister-in-law.

She caught sight of him, put her lamp by her side, placed her delicate hands on the floor, the muslin-de-laine sleeves hugging her forearms, and bowed her head; a ribbon and some colour at the tinsel of a night fluttered; and her decide fairy face appeared through the screen of some back hair. She said, "I am glad to have you home again."

It was impossible not to become deeply enamoured of this exquisite little creature, Sayo-ko, and there is in the description of her love for Tetsuya a grace, a lightness of touch, as though the author were afraid of her vanishing under his pen. And poor little Tetsuya, so cruelly treated by his wife and mother-in-law, plays the lover with a kind of awkward grace which makes us smile as though he were a doll. What could be more delicious than the description of her first meeting in the little "room of six mats" above a shop that he has taken for her?

He entered the store, saying, "Pardon me."

The landlady with good sense called from the bottom of the stairs, "Miss, he's come." She then stepped aside and Tetsuya began to climb; it was not an easy task—"Please be careful," said the landlady, from below.

"All right, ..." But his posture did not look at all right. He reached the top with great difficulty, and found waiting at the entrance of the room—Sayoko.

Later, they decide to go out for the evening.

"To-day let us return to our school-days and have whole-hearted fun."

Sayo-ko was pinning her plush shawl with a butterfly buckle. She smiled. "All right; I will be a romping girl."

"Romping?" Tetsuya exclaimed, in a sudden flush of joy.

"Capital. If you will be a romping girl I will be—I cannot find a corresponding word—" I will be riotous."

The temptation to quote from "An Adopted Husband" is very great, but it is not fair to a novel which is, like so few of our English novels, seen as a whole, and then worked out—so we gain the impression—with deliberate and fastidious care. We could not for the life of us take the tragic happenings tragically—and perhaps we are not meant to, for the author keeps putting little touches as though he too smiled at the little creatures who were caught in such an unpleasant storm, whirled about, so cruelly separated and sent flying in all directions. But let us not convey the impression that "An Adopted Husband" is not a serious work of art—it is. But after a long rolling on the heavy seas of our modern novels the critic feels as though he had stepped into a blue paper boat and was sailing among islands whose flowery branches overhung the water.

Passion. By Shaw Desmond. (Duckworth. 7s. net.)

Well, if the truth were known—are we not curious about everybody we meet? What do we mean when we say that he or she does not interest us?

"A bore, a frightful bore, I shouldn't care if I never set eyes on him again." But how many of us would run away if the rejected one suddenly proposed to tell us what he had never before told anybody—the real, true story of his life? ... We are wary, aloof, and on our guard—Heaven forfend we should be heard crying, like Whitman, "Passing stranger, you do not know how longingly I look upon you”—nevertheless human beings, ever mysterious and strange, are our passion...

One might turn to us and say: "What a feast you must have nowadays, when every third book that is written is a confession!" And every author who does confess is consumed with the desire to leave nothing untold—to take us over the house of his being as it was in the beginning and is now, without any preparations that might create in our minds a false impression of orderliness or comfort.

Here is Mr. Shaw Desmond, for instance, simply determined, we feel, from the very first paragraph, to let nothing of importance pass. From the moment he cut his "prilling teeth"—in his grandmother's blue-veined hand—we shall have the whole of him. He shall brood with him over the time when he was not long out of tartan frocks and "his mind was virgin; ductile; expansive; fluid to the impress of the Power beyond." He will have us cry with him: "Why did it change? Why should sclerosis infiltrate the soul-arteries as Time, the sifter, the cramer, the definer, does his work?" Why? Why? These questions go running through the book, losing their way, for certain, were it not for the three main passages into which they are directed—passages and sets of chambers which Mr. Shaw Desmond inhabits one after the other and which are called Love and Money and Power.

For according to our author it is not possible to tell a human story unless one adopts some such system of division. The whole house cannot be occupied at once; some rooms are bound to be shuttered and dark while the others are in use. He almost asks us, in fine, to forget their existence, while we make our prodigious, solemn rummage in those of the moment. The result is depressing in the extreme. We feel as though we have been conducted over a house wherein three young gentlemen of promise have been attacked by, dreadfully suffered from, and finally out of three years of this parish are not a black pin to choose between their agonies, but—alas the day!—why are they recorded by the author with such dark and fearful relief? Even in the moments of more or less relief, when the poor three-in-one hero very shakily takes the air, apes lurk behind the innocent trees, and girls with the paint dripping on their cheeks in "encarnined lines."

"Passion" fails for the reason that so many of these novels of confession fail. Our curiosity about human beings, our longing to know the story of their lives springs from the desire to "place" them, to see them in their relation to Life as we know it. But Mr. Shaw Desmond and his fellows are under the illusion that they must isolate the subject and play perpetual showman. He has the key, the inventory, the plan for everything. "Turn to the right. Ladies and Gentlemen, and you will observe me at the age of sixteen' "battling with the after-appetite" and dashing out 'nefariously into the powdery face and black humorous eyes of Mr. Belomo. ... to ... spend a whole sixpence on a madeira cake. 'To your left you have me "haunted by the sex-shadows that Sheringham had sterilized." ... No, the voice is too loud, the gesture too crude. Better a half-truth, beautifully whispered, than a whole so solemnly shouted.

MARGINALIA

"See life steadily and see it whole." How infinite a capacity for self-deception human beings possess! This remark was addressed primarily to literary men, and it is quite possible to meet a number of them who will tell you, in those somewhat frequent moments when they at last reveal to you the high seriousness of their secret aims, that their object is to see life steadily and see it whole. It is an object, one would think, that requires great self-discipline and very remarkable powers for its attainment. Take, for instance, the latter half of it: to see life whole. The phrase instantly conjures up a panorama. I think—being literary—of Dr. Johnson's 'from China to Peru'; I pause for a moment to think of the possible strange universes of thought and feeling slumbering in those four hundred million queerly-shaped heads in China; I remember there are some hundreds of millions of Buddhists—people who yearn after what seems to us the ultimate nothingness of Nirvana; half-forgotten stories of lost civilizations come to my mind—a horrible Aztec manuscript I once saw, with its record of a vigorous, artistic people, but so alien, so utterly inhuman! And what were the thoughts and feelings of those who erected the great carven figures on Easter Island?

But this is unnecessary. I am quite sufficiently discomposed by a railway journey. I had been bewildered by the implications in the conversation of a man who is a retired diamond merchant and thinks Bexhill is not what it was, when an old shepherd and his dog became prominent on the platform of a wayside station. The shepherd met my stare with his very young, very bright eyes. I suppose I imagined the slight irony in his glance, but just for a moment I saw that my attempt to live in the country has its comic side. As for the diamond merchant, he knew less about trees and fields, winds and the shapes in the sky, than I did. Such people should be shot through from London to Bexhill in pneumatic tubes. But what does the old shepherd think about it all? Does even Thomas Hardy know?

The last time I heard Matthew Arnold's phrase was from a young and esteemed contemporary with whom I was lunching. He was deploying the "short-windedness" of modern poets; he thought the time had come for poets to essay "comprehension." He mentioned "the Universe," and then he quoted Matthew Arnold's phrase. He is a very pleasant and exceptionally intelligent young man. He frankly cannot understand religious people and he finds the scientific mind unsympathetic; he took a good degree at Oxford and is learned in eighteenth-century French literature. Our conversation was interrupted by two men coming to sit at our table and discussing their own affairs rather loudly. They appeared to be cinema actors, and the extraordinary oddity of some of their sentiments caused my friend and myself to exchange whimsical smiles. He made a little gesture of comic despair as we went out: "Such is life in the great West," he murmured.

When a statement sanctified by long usage is taken at its face value and discovered to be nonsense, the right thing to do seems to be to discover in it a profounder meaning. We need not yet dismiss Matthew Arnold's phrase. We may, which is fashionable, invoke a scientific analogy. A scientist, given an ounce or two of lead, a gill of sulphuric acid, a bladder of gas and a speck of radium, proceeds to legislate for the entire material universe. He looks at some thin black lines on a rainbow-coloured ribbon and says: "There is iron in Sirius." Can we literary people do the same? Can we grasp the whole of life from a few samples? We are accustomed to say that every human being is unique. Can we say that, in the majority of cases, the uniqueness does not matter, that what men have in common is the essential thing? I suppose that no gill of sulphuric acid is exactly like any other gill of sulphuric acid. The scientist can neglect the differences. Can we? If we cannot, it is no use generalizing from our samples. But perhaps this impasse is more apparent than real.

We must be a little less strict about the uniqueness of human beings. It is a doctrine which, if we were stupidly logical, would kill literature. We must at least modify it by adding that convenient phrase "unity in diversity," otherwise we must admit that only a miracle renders Shakespeare and Cervantes still intelligible. So that there is a sense in which uniqueness does not matter. In point of fact the great humanists and novelists have been interested in what men have in common. That is why great writers are also popular. Because they can reveal what is common to humanity they are great; because they do reveal it they are read by all sorts of people. Those of our moderns who stress uniqueness are not, of course, widely read. They are interesting only if you are peculiar in their way—if you have a passion for purple table-cloths, or if you reverence snakes, or if you suffer from a complicated inferiority-complex. Such people would certainly have irritated Matthew Arnold, who, whatever he was, was not " queer." He was always urging people to write from the "centre." It was the same feeling that made him urge people to see life whole. He didn't mean that, because it simply cannot be done. Emphasizing what men have in common is not seeing life whole, but that is probably what he meant. And, after all, how far is even that possible? How do the Chinese regard Shakespeare's characters?

And even if the life known to Shakespeare and Cervantes was a partial life, yet think of what they knew! The London of Shakespeare's time was almost a microcosm, and it is evident that Shakespeare sampled it all. He had a rich, welcoming curiosity; he could hobnob with everybody. And Cervantes, of course, had been everything in his time. Their work is the work of immensely experienced men. What equivalent can we find for this? Our whole attitude is different; we are professional writers in a sense that neither of those two men would have understood. We write first and live incidentally. We are so specialized that even the tiny literary world of England is too large for us; we write for one of three or four cliques into which it is subdivided. We are delicate explorers of every fold in about half-a-dozen craniums, and the rest of mankind—business men, engineers, scientists, saints, East-End Jews—is a blur to us. If we can succeed in talking on level terms with a coal-miner for half an hour, we feel singularly pleased with ourselves. "See life steadily and see it whole." Whatever it means, I am afraid it is not for us.

AUTOLYCUS

The May number of the Chesterian, the excellently produced house magazine of Messrs. Chester, the music publishers, contains a short paper by Mr. Festing Jones on "Samuel Butler as a Musical Critic," which will be welcome to the collectors of ana. Mr. Jones has found in the British Museum some numbers of the Drawing-Room Gazette on which, as readers of the recent " Life," will remember, Mrs. Savage was employed, and to which Butler occasionally contributed musical criticisms. 1920 was the year of Miss Savage's death. But the Colonel would have added: 'And things of that sort,' but there are no 'things of that sort,' except Handel's." We are not surprised, therefore, to find the three notices of which Mr. Jones gives us extracts almost wholly concerned with Handel. Bach's "Passion" comes in for a half-share of one: "We believe it to be one of the dreariest and most unattractive and utterly unlovely works that ever came from the pen of any musician."
NOTES FROM IRELAND

Far be it from the intention of the writer of these strenuously non-political Notes to discuss the sublimine decree of the Government that Ireland shall be partitioned, that the existing recognition of Irish national unity shall be expelled from the records. It may, however, be permissible and interesting to point out a few points wherein the literary space is affected by the great denial. Indeed, I may perhaps be able to show why the much dreaded "politics" of Ireland so ubiquitously intrude into places where the sympathetic foreigner neither expects nor understands them. After all, the word in this special sense is invariably synonymous with nationalism. It is entirely non-political for a Ulsterist to manifest his pride and delight in the British Empire, but when the mere Irishman expresses a corresponding emotion towards his own country his action is "political," at least, if not actually "reasonable."

It so happens that the portion of Ulster which is to be cut off from the remaining twenty-six counties of Ireland is intimately associated with the greatest achievement of Irish literature, the epic of the "Tain Bo Cuailgne." CuChulain, the Achilles of our legend, was the hero of Uladh, the North-East Ulster of to-day. All the stories of the Red Branch, the romance and tragedy of Deirdre and Naisi, are rooted in the soil that is today to be cut off for the foreign nation. In our historical literature many of the most honoured names are those of men whose astonishment would be great if they could witness to-day the decision of the politicians whereby Ulster is detached from the realm of Ireland. The Princes of Uladh played a great part in the struggle for Irish independence, and were the last to surrender. Domhnaill O'Neill led the first national confederacy which made Edward Bruce King of Ireland. Later Shane O'Neill tried to unite the whole country against the common menace of the English conquest. It was another chief from North-East Ulster, Hugh O'Neill, who organized the resistance which eventually, in the end, was led to the great Irish novelist, William Carleton, belonged to Tyrone. Sir Samuel Ferguson, of Belfast, is the poet and archaeologist whose work in both fields made him the starting-point of the Irish literary Renaissance. To use the convenient phrase which describes the creation of a genuinely national Irish literature in the English language, in that movement itself Ulster names are not lacking. The most prominent is that of Mr. George W. Russell (A. E.), whose Armagh birthplace has no more made him safe for Carsonia than John Mitchel's Derry. Others in the same category are Miss Moira O'Neill, author of the popular "Songs of the Glen of Antrim," Miss Alice Milligan, and Dr. George St. George, the literary historian of the modern literary movement. An Irish Dictionary of National Biography, if it existed, would enable me to exhaust the subject and your patience. Let these names, as they occur to me, suffice.

At an assembly of foreigners, assisted by a small group of Englishmen materially interested in the transaction, proceeded to carve up England in accordance with the precedent now created, what would happen? Stratford would be declared outside the jurisdiction of the English Government, and as the decision would rest upon national grounds, Shakespeare would be represented as the prophet of literature as an interesting foreign writer. Whatever counties produced Drake and Nelson would find themselves similarly ostracised as being un-English. Many of the places associated with the most glorious epochs and events in your national story would become alien territory. If Mr. Thomas Hardy were, under this régime, to return to his birthplace he would find Dorset-shire, as A. E. would find Armagh, under an administration to which he, and all his works, would be anathema. Such transmutations have, of course, occurred before now in the external affairs of mankind, but the literary historian is forced to ask himself whether we are progressing backwards to that point when national unity could be fixed by a mere ukase resting on force. And he will recall with a sense of its appropriateness the title of the Ulsterman Mitchell's book, "The Last Conquest of Ireland (Perhaps)." Is this an attempt?

THE BRITWELL COURT AND OTHER SALES

On Thursday, April 29, and the following day, Messrs. Sotheby sold books and manuscripts, of which the following were the most important: E. L. Stevenson, Memoirs of Robert Bruce, 1518, New Arabian Nights, 2 vols., 1882, £102. Chaucer, Works, Kelmscott Press edition, 1806, £162. Hours a Psalme of Paris, Hardymon, c. 1518, £10; a Psalme of Rome, c. 1567, £76; Horae B.V.M., French, 155th century, £14; another, £250. New Custom, an Interlude, 1573, £155. Dekker and Webster, Northward Hoe, 1607, £98. J. Webster, The White Divel, 1612, £150. Lady Elizabeth Carew, The Tragedie of Marian, 1613, £90. Shakespeare, Poems, 1594, £250; Works, Second Folio, 1632, £400. Missal ad usum ecclesiae Eboracensis, English MS. 15th century, £475. Heideloff, Gallery of Fashion, 9 vols., £1704, 1803, £225. £140. The total of the two sales was £9,813.

Messrs. Sotheby were engaged from May 3 to May 7 in selling two further portions of the Britwell Court Library. On the 3rd and 4th the sale consisted of books from the library of J. A. de Thou and books in fine bindings, the chief prices being: A. & B. Novum, vnum historia, bound by C. J. Almon, £145. Plaidoyez et harangues de Monsieur le Maistre, 1575, in a signed binding by Bordmore Ladur, £140. A French commonplace book, bound "a la fafane" for Louis de Marillac (d. 1672), £285. Doni, Letters, etc., 1744-7, bound for T. Maioil, £92. Ovid, Heroides and Metamorphoses, 1468-7, in a fine contemporary Italian binding, £250. S. Niger, Translationes, 1521, bound for J. de Sambay (d. 1656), £300. Heures de la real, 1516, £100. bound by A. M. Papeloup, £400. Selden, Marc Clausum, 1655, bound for Charles I., £86. Della Stella, Meditations de l'amer de Dic, 1586, bound for Henri III, £150. G. Villani, Chronicle, 1587, with the dedication signed to Demetrico Colonna. These books were bought by Chois Eve for Marie Marguerite de Valois de Saint Rémy: Justinius, 1585, £88. J. Ravisius, Dialogi, 1590, £74. A. Vesulus, De humani Corporis fabrica, 2 vols., 1542, £140.

The total of the two sales was £16,677.

In their annual report for 1919 the Committee of Management of the Incorporated Society of Authors, Playwrights and Composers record the largest annual election since the foundation of the Society; 380 new members were elected, bringing the total membership up to 2,800.
Science

THE YEAR

I t would be rash to say that a purely scientific curiosity played no part in the origins of astronomy, but whatever the motives may have been that inspired the early sages, it is certain that practical considerations made their discoveries imperative. The oldest astronomical discoveries of which we have trustworthy account, such as the Egyptian, were made in agricultural countries. In such countries seasonal changes and their recurrence are obviously of the first importance, and we may reasonably assume that attempts to fix the length of the year were made very early in the history of such a country. Doubtless, the time separating two warm seasons served as the first rough approximation to the length of a year, but the frequent, yet unpredictable variations in this length must soon have necessitated the adoption of a more constant standard. It is easy enough to determine what this standard must have been.

At some given period, say in the spring, let us observe the position of sunset with respect to trees, houses, or what not on the horizon. As we repeat the observations, day by day, we find the point of sunset shifting towards the north, at first with some rapidity, and then more and more slowly. Finally, a point is reached where, for some time, no further movement takes place. But as the observations are continued, we find that the sun begins to move slowly back towards the south. This movement quickens to a maximum, and then slows down again to another stationary point on the other side of our original starting-place. The first stationary point is what is known as the summer solstice and the second as the winter solstice. The time which elapses between two successive solstices of the same kind is a year. This method of determining the length of the year is very simple, but it does not lend itself to any great exactitude, for the sun's motion near a solstice is too slow to permit the time at which it reaches a given point to be determined exactly. It was early recognized, however, that it is not necessary to employ the solstitial points in determining the year; any intermediate point will do—the farther from a solstice the better, as then the sun's motion is more rapid. It was doubtless also noticed that the days are longer than the nights at a summer solstice, and shorter at a winter solstice. Hence it was easy to infer the existence of equinoxes, where days and nights are of equal length. It was not so easy, however, to determine the equinoctial points, for the sun's motion between two solstices is complex and the mid-point does not correspond to an equinox. Some authorities claim that the Egyptians were enabled to determine these points from the positions of their pyramids, and Mariette, in 1853, found that the Grand Pyramid enabled him to determine the vernal equinox within thirty hours of its true time, in spite of the considerable irregularities, produced by weathering, in the faces and edges of the pyramid. It is this year, the time between two successive vernal equinoxes, which is the basis of our calendar. Its present value, neglecting fractions of a second, is 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 46 seconds, which is roughly 365[1/4] days.

This value, 365[1/4] days, seems to have been attributed to the year from a very early age. There is some reason to suppose that the Egyptians used a year of this length some thousands of years ago. The civil and religious year was exactly 365 days, a year which, at the end of 700 years, would make summer crops grow in the middle of winter. For agricultural purposes, however, they seem to have employed the more exact year of 365[1/4] days, determining it by noting the times at which Sirius and the Sun rose together. The same year seems to have been used by the Chaldeans considerably later, and the Greeks were slow in discovering it. The latter, indeed, used a year of 360 days for a long time, but the famous cycle proposed by Meton gives a year of 365.24 days.

Our own calendar is based on the Julian calendar, which Julius Caesar constructed with the help of the Alexandrian astronomer, Sosigenes. Many of the early calendars suffered from the attempt to co-ordinate the lunar month with the year, but Caesar abandoned all such attempts. He adopted the year of 365.25 days and ordained that every fourth year should contain an extra day. This year, however, is not correct. The equinox-year is longer than the true mean interval by about 14 seconds. The date of the equinox, therefore, comes about 3 days too early in 400 years. By the year 1582 the date of the vernal equinox, instead of occurring on March 21, as at the time of the Council at Nice, occurred on March 11. This state of affairs was remedied by Pope Gregory, acting under the advice of the Jesuit astronomer, Clavius. He ordered ten days to be jumped, and altered the rule for leap-year to its present form. Protestant nations were slow to adopt the change; in England it was not adopted till 1752 and the change led to great disturbances. In Bristol several people were killed during the rioting of the indignant populace, which clamoured for the eleven days of which it conceived itself to have been robbed. The change was not universal even then; indeed, it is only within the last year or so that Russia and the Greek Church have abandoned the Julian calendar.

The Gregorian calendar itself is not quite accurate. After about 4,000 years the error is one day. For practical purposes, therefore, it will give a sufficient approximation to the true equinoxial year for some time to come. The equinoxial year is the important year for calendar purposes as the seasons depend on the sun's place with respect to the equinoxes. It is not, however, the only possible year. The word 'year' is ambiguous until the recurrent phenomena referred to are specified. The equinoxial year is not, for instance, the time taken by the earth to complete a revolution round the sun. This time is determined by noting the positions of the 'fixed' stars, and is about 20 minutes longer than the equinoxial year. The difference exists because the equinoctial points are not quite stationary on the earth's orbit. Their motion, called the precession of the equinoxes, means that the sun meets the vernal equinox sooner than it would if the equinoctial points were stationary. Besides this motion there is a motion of the earth's actual orbit in space. The line joining the point on the earth's orbit that is nearest the sun to the point on its orbit farthest from the sun always moves slowly towards the east. If, therefore, we reckon the year as the interval between two successive passages of the earth nearest to or farthest from the sun, we obtain a year a little longer than the sidereal year. The interval of time separating members of this third set of recurrent phenomena is called the anomalistic year, and is the longest of the three years by about five minutes.

Societies

ROYAL.—April 20.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.—The following papers were read:

The Irish Eskers" by Professor J. W. Gregory. "Eskers" are banks of sand and gravel, typically occurring as ridges on the central plain of Ireland, where they were deposited during the recession of the ice at the close of the glacial period. They have generally been attributed to deposition along glacial rivers, like Swedish osar. Their structure and composition indicate that the most important Irish eskers were formed along the margin of the receding ice sheet, although floods of water due to the melting of the ice. It is proposed that the term "esker" should be continued for Irish ridges and mounds of sand and gravel, but that in glacial geology the term osar should be used for ridges formed along the course of glacial rivers, and hence used for ridges deposited by water along the margin of an ice sheet.

Geological. May 6.—Sir R. T. Oldham, President, in the chair. The following communications were read: "The De dian of Fossils (Lower Boulonnais)," by Mr. J. W. Dudley Robinson. Mr. L. D. Stamp congratulated the author on the interest in the district in which he had worked. "The Cambrian Horizons of Comley (Shropshire)," and their Brachiopoda, Pteropoda, Gastropoda, etc., by Mr. E. E. Sterling Cobbold. - Illustrating the author's paper of 1911, printed Q.J.G.S., vol. xlvii, pp. 282 et seq. Lantern-slides and rock-samples were exhibited by Mr. W. Dudley Robinson in illustration of his paper, and diagrams and drawings of fossils were exhibited on behalf of Mr. E. S. Cobbold.

Linnean. May 6.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair. Mr. A. Lionel Gooday was admitted a Fellow. The following were elected Fellows: Mr. S. Percy-Lancaster, Mr. H. W. Pugsley, Mr. J. Omer-Cooper, Miss Lucy E. Cox, Dr. G. K. Sutherland, Mr. H. B. Harding, and Mrs. Elinor Egerton Harde.

The following were elected Foreign Members: Professor Gaston Bonnier, Professor Victor Ferdinand Brothers, Professor Giovanni Battista de Toni, Professor Louis Dool, Professor Paul Marchal, and Professor Holger Roost. Dr. G. P. Bidder read three communications on Sponges, which were discussed by Professor Deny, Mr. Harold Russell and Mr. J. B. Gatesby (visitor), the author replying. Mr. Edward L. Bedford showed a series of thirty exquisite water-colour drawings from British marsh orchids, with their numerous varieties and hybrids, further illustrated by seventy lantern-slides from his photographs of the growing plants in situ. Mr. H. W. Pugsley and Mr. T. A. Dykes contributed further remarks.

Royal Institution. May 1. Annual Meeting. Sir James Crichton-Browne, Treasurer and Vice-President, in the chair. The annual report of the Committee of Visitors for the year 1919, testifying to the continued prosperity and efficient management of the Institution, was read and adopted; and the report of the Davy-Faraday Research Laboratory Committee was also read. The books and pamphlets presented amounted to 193 volumes, making with 399 volumes (including periodicals purchased) purchased by the managers a total of 592 volumes added to the library in the year.

The following were unanimously elected as officers for the ensuing year: President, the Duke of Northumberland; Treasurer, Sir James Crichton-Browne; Secretary, Col. E. H. Hills; Managers: Dr. H. T. Brown, J. H. Balfour Browne, J. W. Buchanan, W. A. Burdett-Coutts, Sir J. J. Dobbie, Dr. J. Dunsford Grant, Dr. D. C. R. E. Wood, Miss E. B. H. May, Sir Ernest Moon, Sir Charles Parsons, Sir James Reid, Sir Ernser Rutherford, the Right Hon. C. Scott-Dickson, and Sir Henry Wood, Visitors, Sir Hugh Bell, Sir W. H. Bennett, W. K. Boshield, J. G. Britton, Frank Clove, Miss Margaret Ellis, Miss J. J. Keynes, Miss J. M. Leson, T. B. Lightfoot, F. K. McLean, W. S. Norman, H. M. Rose, J. Shaw, T. H. Sowerby, and Sir Almroth Wright.

May 3. Sir James Crichton-Browne, Treasurer and Vice-President, in the chair. The Chairman reported the death of Dr. Rudolph Messel, and a resolution of condolence with the relatives was passed. Sir John Cadman, Miss de Lara, Mrs. Duncan Mackinnon, Hon. Lady Parsons, Lieut.-Col. W. W. Bailey, Mr. Marcus Samuel, and Mr. R. E. Thomas were elected Members.

Society of Antiquaries. May 6. Mr. W. Minet, Treasurer, in the chair. Lieut.-Col. H. F. Bidder read a paper on recent discoveries in the Anglo-Saxon cemetery at Mitcham. The Mitcham cemetery during the excavations had been much larger than was at first supposed. The site extended to ground across the Mitcham-Morden road, where, in the middle of the last century, numbers of bones and relics had been turned up in the cultivation of lavender and liquorice. In the last few years further remains had been found and some of the objects had been preserved.

In the field where excavation was originally begun, further graves had been opened, and there was every indication of a large number likely to be yet found, and it would be possible that the cemetery contained between three and four hundred graves. It was thus larger than any Saxon cemetery so far discovered in England, with the exception of that at Stamford in Lincolnshire. The character of the objects found confirmed the opinion that the cemetery was an extremely early one. A pierced bronze buckler lately discovered was of Romano-Celtic type. Several swords had been found, in two cases with bands of gilt bronze, ornamented with interlaced grooves, round the shaft. The orientation of the bodies was very irregular. While the majority were laid in an easterly direction, a considerable number were not.

Professor G. Parsons gave some particulars of the measurements of the skeletons and other bones. He found in the skulls a greater element of the Nordic or Celtic type than usual in Anglo-Saxon skulls from cemeteries in this country. This might point to admixture with the native race and would tend to corroborate the early date of the cemetery.

Zoological. April 27. Dr. A. Smith Woodward, Vice-President, in the chair. The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during March. Mr. Arthur Lord EDGEWORTH-MYNS and Mr. C. H. CHURCHILL travelled to southern Africa on a collection of snakes which he has obtained in East Africa during 1915-19. Miss L. E. Cheesman exhibited and described a series of lantern-slides illustrating the life-history and habits of the ichneumonid, Rhyssa pustulata. Dr. P. Chalmers Mitchell exhibited and made remarks on a series of photographs (taken by Sir H. A. Byatt in German East Africa) of the rare Abbe's duiker (Cephalophus sylvaticus). Dr. D. H. Smith exhibited a series of lantern-slides showing the life-history of the blond duiker (Lophophorus imyioua). Mr. L. Hogben exhibited a specimen of Amblystoma, the metamorphosis of which had been brought about by about one month's cultivation with ox-tongue, and drew special attention to theatrocious transition to the Amblystoma-type of pigmentation during the metamorphosis.

In the absence of the author, Mr. F. F. Laidlaw's paper on "Contributions to a Study of the Dragonfly Fauna of Burma: Part IV. A List of the Species known to occur in the Island," was taken as read. Dr. C. W. Andrews gave a résumé of Dr. R. Bloom's paper "On some New Theropod Reptiles from the Karroo Beds of South Africa."

Forthcoming Meetings.

King's College, 5.30.— "Bergson's Concept of Mind: Intellectual Effort," by Professor H. Wildon Carr.

Philological, 5.30.— "Dictionary Evening," by Mr. T. O. Towns.

University College, 5.30.— "Roman Education," by Professor E. Butler.

Royal Institution, 9.— "The Thermionic Valve in Wireless Telegraphy and Telephony," by Professor J. A. Fleming.

Sat. 22. Royal Institution, 3.— "The Reaction, and the Critics of the Post-War School of Thought," by Dr. Frederic Harrison.

Bedford College, 4.— "The Development of the Steam Train before Chaucer," Lecture IV., Professor Carleton Brown.

King's College, 5.30.— "Kant's Aesthetic Theory," Lecture IV., Professor H. Wildon Carr.

University College, 5.30.— "Flanders and England in History," by M. H. Sutcliffe.

Thurs. 27. Royal Institution, 3.— "Dreams, with Special Reference to Psycho-Analysis," by Mr. W. Archer.

Luncheon, 5.30.— "Linnean Society, University College, 5.30.— "Giuseppe Parini," Lecture II., Professor Cipriani.

School of Oriental Studies, Linbury Circus, 6.— "Tibet," by Mr. E. H. C. Walsh.

HOUSING AND FURNISHING

THERE is much talk of Housing at the present time, valuable and necessary talk, but yet up to the present it is a case of much talk and little house. Still it is necessary to try to stir up general interest, even enthusiasm and passion, in the hope that a real beginning may soon be made.

Housing, of course, is not merely a cottage question; it is an immense national question and also an immediately individual question in which we should all be decidedly interested. Housing is health and temper and a large part of living. It must be one of a very few greatest of all questions. Pride of home is pride of country. Housing is the necessary preliminary "plant" and "capital" for our national life. We have to accumulate force for renewal. We need to clear our general aims and to consider our policy as a whole. Our aim should be to develop a fine tradition of living in houses. It is a matter for experiment, like flying. We should seek to improve in detail point by point. There are enough sketch designs; now we want solids. Exquisite living on a small scale is the ideal. "House-like" should express as much as "shipshape." Our airplanes and motors and even bicycles are in their way perfect. We need to bring this ambition for perfect solutions into housing of all sorts and scales.

The chief obstruction to our having better houses has been the superstition that they should be built in a style. There is great difference between being built in an imitative style. Elizabethan, Jacobean or Georgian, and being built with style. "Motor+car is built with thought for "style," that is finish and elegance, but it is not built to look like a sedan chair or a stage coach. To be concerned with style imitations and what the Americans call period design is not only irrational in itself, but it blocks the way to any possibility of true development. If you have your eye on that you can't see this. To go on building houses in the cocked-hat and brass-candestick style is not only rather imbecile play-acting, but it destroys rational growth. We have to put an efficiency style in the place of this trivial, sketchy picturesque. Even leaving out the style trimmings would be something. If you cut away disease and sores and strengthen you consolidate. There are many cases in which the half is greater than the whole. We have to prune our building forms as we prune a fruit tree and sternly cut away the dead wood. Whenever we concentrate on some directing datum, some reality like health, serviceableness or even perfect cheapness, true style will certainly arise as the expression of this and the other human qualities embodied. To design in "a style" is to design a seeming which stands in the place of style proper. This style superstition is a much greater evil than I could persuade you to believe. It filters down to lower and lower strata, and the poor man is at last persuaded that nightmares of vulgarity and discomfort are necessary offerings to "style.

The dwelling-house should be sound, dry, light, warm and sweet. We should save in all thoughtless extravagances, and concentrate on the conquest of dirt, disorder and waste. Houses must be built for living rather than for letting. A false and confusing opposition between science and craft has been allowed to arise, and indeed is rather fostered by expert simulators who "go in for old-world effects"; but properly there is no strife between science and art in architecture. It does not matter a bit if we call flying an art or a science; the art of house building is practically one with the science of housing.

If we must worry over strict definitions, "science" may stand for codified preliminary knowledge, and "art" for operative skill, experiment and adventure. Science is what you know; art is what you do. The best art is founded on the best science in every given matter. The art of shipbuilding is the science of shipbuilding in operation. The notion that there are special "art forms" or "art colours" has led to all sorts of pretences and sham picturesque. Art is high competence in doing what is worthy to be done. Very occasionally there is in art a sort of poetry over and above: such addition of feeling, can be expressed by giving it an H and calling it heart.

Soundness and convenience, light and heat are the great essentials in house-building. In planning a house there are two main requirements which are to some extent in opposition and must be compromised in various ways: the needs for sunlight and for compactness. The difference between a sunlit room and one that is not so blessed is so great that it cannot be measured. To get sun in every room, some spreading of the south front is desirable, but much can be done by projections and bay windows. On the other hand, a square unbroken plan is the most economical and conserves heat. Four straight walls will cut the greatest space when they form an exact square, and all ins and outs are costly in respect to walls. Again, simple roofs are less expensive and much sounder than complicated ones. A too "picturesque" roof will certainly become a leak in your income. Fireplaces should be put in the internal walls to keep the heat in the house.

Other things being equal, so far as may be, preference should be given to local materials and to traditional ways of using them. This traditional use is embodied experience. On the other hand, we should beware of supposing that any reasonable materials such as concrete cast-iron or plastering are necessarily inartistic. It is the business of art to use the materials given to us by Nature so that they will look well; and when they are well used they will look well. For example, there seems to be an assumption that Welsh slating is inartistic; but this can only be the effect on us of the dreary rows of little speculative red-brick houses which we have seen that have such roofs or rather lids. If the houses ceased to be dreary the slates would soon look quite another colour. Some slight modification showing that there had been care for good work would at once make a difference; and at last they might glow with the light of heaven. Concrete should be frankly used. If blocks are better for constructive reasons, then use blocks by all means, but do not imitate stone. The surfaces should be finished with white or colour wash.

Frankness is the great thing; disguises and subterfuges are always repulsive in building. Bungling, pretence and compromise are the enemies to be feared.

NOTES ON ART SALES

The figure reached at Christie's on May 14 for Romney's "Sir Christopher and Lady Sykes," 97in. by 73in., was £2,830. The same artist's "Misses Mary and Louisa Kent," 32in. by 27in., was purchased by Messrs. Colnaghi & Obach for £9,000; and his "Mrs. Morley," 29in. by 24in., for £9,075 (Morton). Raeburn's "Lady Behavin," 35in. by 27in., fetched £9,975 (Ashburton); his "Mrs. John Pictorain," 36in. by 26in., £1,095 (Croal Thomson); and his "Lieut.-Col. Alexander Mackenzie Fraser," 29in. by 24in., £1,012 10s. (Connell). "Francis Basset," by Reynolds, 49in. by 38in., made £2,925 (Kent); and Lawrence's "Lady Blessington," 29in. by 24in., £1,050 (Colnaghi). The portraits of Lord Brooke, 38in. by 42in., by Nattier (£3,675), and of that of Countess Albizzi by Vigée le Brun, 18in. by 14in. (£1,022 10s.), went to Messrs. Agnew; and a Holy Family with the infant St. John, by Ghirlandajo, on a 38-inch circular panel, was sold for £977 10s. (Ballard).

IMPRESSIONISM.

I

MPRESSIONISM was born of English parentage on foreign soil, and the Academy had no difficulty in ignoring its existence until it was long past its prime. For its claims were not insistent and local like the claims of Pre-Raphaelitism, and it was not championed by Ruskin. When Manet and his friends were fighting their battles in Paris there was only one impressionist painter of certain repute in England, and he was an American whom Ruskin denounced as a charlatan. In these circumstances there was no need to compromise. But by 1903 when Whistler died the situation had completely changed. Impressionism had triumphed and had become a tradition throughout Europe. It was so much the fashion that even the attenuated variety provided by the Glasgow School was sufficient to procure an international reputation for its purveyors. With reluctance the Academy decided that the moment for a cautious recognition had arrived. Forty years after the French Impressionists had opened the flood-gates to modern art, twenty-five years after the Post-Impressionists had commenced to direct the torrent into classical channels, and a hundred years after Constable and Turner had forecast the future, the Academy reconciled itself to the admission of a little mild pointillism, a little broken colour, and an occasional plein air study.

The most effective Impressionist echoes in the present exhibition are those of Philip Connard, "Oratio Obliqua" (561), to prove that the jury had "moved with the times" and had not remained blind to modern tendencies in art. We trust that no one has been hoodwinked by this rather impertinent attempt to exploit a scholarly, ingenious and painstaking artist. For the art of Mr. Bayes is in no way characteristic of the Post-Impressionist or Cubist tradition. It harks back to Impressionism itself via the art of Mr. Sickert. This was very evident in the vast illustration of a scene in a London Tube Station during an Air Raid, with which Mr. Bayes stormed the Academy three years ago. In this year's picture (as in those of last year) the true nature of Mr. Bayes' art is obscured by a purple and green colour formula (which is mere affectation) and an intelligently devised and skilfully executed conventional representation of a ray of light breaking across the middle plane. Shorn of these trappings, the picture becomes something which we have all seen many times before.

"Oratio Obliqua" is perhaps the most ambitious work in the Exhibition, and its composition is large, and interesting because it is elaborately mannered in treatment. But its emotional content is so slight that it could be contained in a small lithograph. By exhibiting these pompous machines at Burlington House Mr. Bayes has allowed the Academy to gain a certain amount of false kudos at his expense, and he has received a certain measure of publicity in return.

A BAXTER LICENSE

The Le Blond Book. By C. T. Courtney Lewis. (Sampson Low & Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

In 1849 Le Blond & Co., printers, of Walbrook, London, obtained a licence from George Baxter to trade in prints produced by his patent oil-colour process, and from this date until about 1860 they issued continuously a large number of such prints. The little book before us is designed as a guide to and catalogue of their output, and it forms, incidentally, an appendix to the author's larger work on George Baxter. We cannot pretend to share Mr. Courtney Lewis's enthusiasm for Mr. Le Blond and Le Blond prints, although we recognize their importance in the history of colour printing. Mr. Lewis praises the Baxter print as "in effect a printed oil painting," and claims that the process renders pictures in their "natural and proper colours"; we infer from such utterances that he is insensible to the fundamental craft error inherent in any attempt to give a sheet of paper the appearance of an oil painting. Baxter's skill and patience were wasted because he set out with false ideals; he was a bad craftsman because he took no delight in the surface upon which he worked, but tried instead to conceal and disguise it. Abraham Le Blond followed him into the same error; he was also less skilful as a printer. There seems to us some reason to suppose that Philip Conard, Mr. Bayes' arm, himself executed any designs for his prints; unlike Baxter, who sometimes produced elaborate compositions for the purpose of reproduction, Le Blond seems always to have employed artists; but he rarely had the courtesy to mention their names on his prints. His selection of subject and treatment was always popular and in harmony with the trivial and sentimental taste of the day. There is a certain sartorial and historical charm in such a print as "Her Majesty at Osborne," representing Queen Victoria, the Prince Consort and Prince Albert Edward in costumes of the period; but we cannot endorse Mr. Lewis's admiration for the Morland "ovals," although we are prepared to admit that they "present novelty and subtle designs to put our brains upon the rack." The catalogue is, nevertheless, a useful work of reference; let us hope that it will not be a stimulant to increase the already excessive vogue of these prints.

R. H. W.
THE DECORATION OF "AS YOU LIKE IT"

I t is difficult to analyse the agreeable impression created by Mr. Nigel Playfair's production of "As You Like It" at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith. Many factors contribute: the complete absence of pomposity in every department, the unpretentious and charming music, the youth and almost amateur enthusiasm of the players, the accomplished but unaffected elocution of Miss Athene Seyler, the grace of Miss Mc'Gill, and the humorous embouchment of the wrestler. But, above all, the atmosphere of gaiety depends, we believe, above all on the brilliant colours and primitive straightforwardness of Mr. Lovat Fraser's decorations. They are not the delicate pink and lemon and white of Mr. Rutherford's theatrical decorations (though Miss Mc'Gill's dress as Phoebe might have been designed by him); they are scarlet and green and ultramarine, with a dash of gold tinsel in the best "Penny Plain and Twopence Coloured" tradition, and their very garishness frees us at once from the oppression of the grand luxury productions and the "artiness" of the plain curtain variety. At the Lyric Theatre we feel that "As You Like It" is the only possible title for the show placed before us, because every detail is designed in that spirit, every dress is a light-hearted experiment, every head-dress a gesture of frivolity. To those who have been educated at His Majesty's Theatre, Mr. Playfair's production must appear like an impromptu charade. But is not spontaneity the very keynote of "As You Like It," and was not Shakespeare's idea of a comedy performance much more like a charade than the magnificence of "Chu Chin Chow"?

"RUPAM"

Indian art, so long despised by Europe, has at last begun to enjoy a more sympathetic attention and a closer study, though it is still too often discussed from a partisan point of view, on one side or the other. The Tokyo magazine, the Kokka, has for many years been making known the masterpieces of Japanese and Chinese art in superb reproductions. Rupam, the first number of which has just reached England, essays to do the same sort of service to Indian art. It is edited by Mr. O. Gangoly, well known to students by his work on the bronzes of Southern India; and it promises to be scholarly and instructive. A beautiful spread of a panel, with a single figure, from Mamallapuram (seventh century) forms an attractive frontispiece. Painting is represented by a series of Nepalese miniatures, illustrating an article by E. Vredenburg, to be concluded later, on the Continuity of Pictorial Tradition in Indian Art. The singular gap between the frescoes of the seventh century and the small paintings of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries has been often noted; but this great hiatus is quite explicable, and it is certain that the tradition was maintained, though a whole world of art has perished except some few relics like those Nepalese paintings. The reproductions of these are in colour. Other articles deal with Gandara, and with architectural ornament, both of real value for students. We hope that examples will be given, later on, of the lovely paintings and drawings of Rajputana. But Rupam promises well. It may be of interest to note that the magazine is printed on hand-made paper, made in Bengal. It is supported by the Indian Society of Oriental Art in Calcutta.

On Monday, April 29, and the two following days, Messrs. Sotheby sold the engravings of the late Mr. Lawson Thompson, the chief prices being: A. Durer, The Nativity, £200; The Passion of Jesus Christ, 18 plates, £600; The Prodigal Son, £50; St. Hubert, £120; Melancholia, £190; Knight, Death and the Devil, £225; The Life of the Virgin, £80. Rembrandt, The Angel appearing to the Shepherds, £50; The Triumph of Mordecai, £62; Landscape with Cottage and Hay Barn, £61; The Windmill, £145; Cottage and Farm Buildings, with a man sketching, £112.

Music

A VENETIAN CARNIVAL

Y ears and years ago Vernon Lee wrote a book about Italy in the eighteenth century. It was a book in which vast learning was presented with a charming air of sentimental elegance, but it came, like all works of genius, before its time, and although a second edition was issued not very long ago, it is a book which has not found many readers. And it is probably little compensation to the writer to know that those few readers are at least always ready to read it over and over again. A generation later a sprightly Frenchman, observing that the picture-dealers had begun to take a serious interest in Guardi and Tiepolo, read Vernon Lee and wrote his own book about Venice in the eighteenth century. He did not know much about music, but fortunately for him Vernon Lee knew a great deal, and possessed too the art of writing about it in language so free from technicalities as to afford no difficulties to a translator. The French book arrived just at the right moment. Besides, English people are always on the look out for French books that are really nice, and when art is approached with such a superior if the book you are carrying is not obviously a Baedeker. So, nowadays, we are all quite at home in Venice of the eighteenth century, or at any rate feel it our duty to appear to be at home in it since M. Diaghilev introduced us to his good-humoured ladies.

They danced to some very delightful music at the Coliseum, but Venetian it was not, unless some learned researcher succeeds in proving that Scarlatti came under the permanent influence of local folk-song when he studied at Venice under Gasparini in 1708. The real music of Venice in those frivolous days can be found by those who know where to look for it, but it is comparatively unfamiliar even to musicians who are definitely interested in eighteenth-century Italian song. The names which appear in our concert programmes—Scaialtti, Pergolesi, Leo, Durante—belong not to Venice but to Naples. Galuppi, whose comic operas were once the rage of London, is now remembered only by that toccata which he never composed. It was Galuppi whom Burney considered to have had more influence on English composers than any other musician of his day. Everything comes to London, music included: and if you want to know the sort of songs that the good-humoured ladies and their gentlemen friends really used to sing, it is in a London-printed edition that you may find them. Three volumes of popular Venetian songs in the Venetian dialect, composed by Signor Hasse and others, were issued by a London publisher in the eighteenth century. Hasse was a German by birth, but he had been a pupil of old Scarlatti at Naples, and even while officially Kapellmeister at Dresden kept constantly in touch with Venice, where he spent the last years of his life in retirement. His three volumes may be met with occasionally in old music shops. There are other collections in manuscript, some in England—there is a good collection by Angelo Colonna in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge—and others in foreign libraries. From one of these sources a selection of songs has just been published in modern dress under the editorship of Dr. Hermann Springer, the head of the musical department of the National Library at Berlin, under the title of "Canzonette da battello, aus Auswahl venezianischer Gesänge aus der ersten Hälfte des achtzehnten Jahrhunderts von Hermann Springer und Edward Buhle." (Berlin, Schlesinger. M.4). They bear no composers' names, but the style is generally that of Galuppi and Hasse. Some of them may perhaps have been take from comic operas, but they are not in the usual operatic form. They have no da capo, but are simple little songs, generally with several verses. Some of them have refrains to be sung in chorus. They remind an English reader at once of the popular songs of Arne and his contemporaries.

As Arne sings of Polly... and other unromantically-named damsels, so the Venetian songs of Batta and Anzioletta in the plain colloquial style of Goldoni's comedies. To a German reader they recall rather some of the German songs of the period, such as the "Willst du dein Herz mir schenken?" in Anna Magdalena Bach's song-book; and the German editor, who, by the way, has shown a most un-German carelessness in the correction of his proofs, has sometimes been tempted, as any editor is who prides himself on scholarship, to treat the accompaniments in a style that suggests the Thomaskirche rather than the Rialto.

The songs are well worth reading if only for the sake of the words. They are not poetry of a high order, but they give a vivid picture of Venetian popular life. If Venice in the eighteenth century possessed a Raquel Meller, one could well imagine her singing such a ditty as this, set to a melody that Bach might not have been ashamed to write out in his wife's book:

Vago e no torno più, bondi, te lasso;
se ti m'ha trattà mal,
mi te perdone.
El ciel t'aggiura, t'aggiuro tutto el ben,
za'l cuor che xe in sto sen,
mi te lo dono.
Almanco no me odiar, te prego, o cara,
mi no t'ho fatto mal,
questa zè vera.
Avanti de partir
dârme solo un bondi
e fâme un fâ de pi
de bona ciera.

But there is satire as well as pathos. Bettina is one of those pretty ladies who in carnival time are delightful but expensive company. Her admirer, who evidently takes after his father Pantalone more than Pantalone himself would ever admit, disposes of her politely but firmly:

Cara Bettina,
dolce mia Xina,
cei in rovina
no posso andar.
De piu diria,
a xe finia,
abbie la bonta
de perdonar, questo xe quello
che posso far.

She soon finds another friend, who can afford to bring a boat-load of musicians to serenade her. The gondolier looks on with a knowing eye:

Semo alla riva,
siò illustissimo,
la vostra diva
vedo al balcon.
Con forte strepito tocchê quei pidari, battê quei timpani
sonê ! trombon !
Godèvela, carissima,
a spalle del paron !

We see her learning to dance the minuet with a French dancing-master who talks a mixture of French and Venetian. As she stands on her balcony she is hailed by half-a dozen familiar Venetian figures—the boy with the marmoset that dances to the merlitt, the man who has a parrot to sell—

El vol descorvere, farne finezze,
el vuol carezze,
de vu granmetto
S'e inamorà.

"E's in love with yer already, lidy!" There is the Turk with his embroideries and carpets, the beggar-woman who calls herself a pilgrim, and one of those horrid Germans who are always drunk—Wein, Weib und Gesang, they were singing just the same songs in the days of Lorenzo de' Medici three hundred years before.

The other gentleman is practising economy. But a gondola is always cheap, "e pô el batello xe un gusto bello," if only there was not such a crowd on the Grand Canal. The gondoliers in eighteenth-century Venice were little different from London taxi-drivers—

Premi via, preni o stai, se premer no ti vol!
A far al barcaiò,
di me, chi t'ha insegnà?

After all, there are better occupations than love-making. Lovers are poor company. If they dance they muddle their steps, if they sing they are out of tune, if they laugh it is false merriment:

A coro che se canta
mi voglio tutti quanti, ma che no gh' intra amanti che gh'abbia el cuor strazza.

Coro : Volemo bevarci che gh'abbia allegri i cuori, fa questi l'allegria,
quando i ha ben zuzza.

Was Dr. Arne one of that merry company? For over in London he sings to much the same rhythm—

Come drink till every taper shines like two,
Let whining Love in bumpers deep be drown'd,
And all things like the circling glass go round.

COVENT GARDEN
PELLÉAS ET MÉLISANDE

In the days before the war " Pelléas et Mélisande " was still a much-discussed opera. An eminent British composer of operas had gone to hear it and had walked out after the first act, saying, no doubt, like Grétry at " Uthal "—" Je donnerais un louis pour entendre une chanterelle." Some said it was the ideal of all operas, others that it was not an opera at all. Take any page of it at random, and it was beautiful; as a whole, intolerably boring. Somewhere about the third act, if not before, a brass band at the back of one's brain would start playing the march from " Aida." It was worse than boredom, it was suffocation, paralysis, anæsthesia....

Five years make a great change in one's outlook. " Very early Debussy, isn't it?" we say loftily; " almost Wagnerian!" It has passed out of the region of discussion. Mr. Percy Pitt conducts it. He even conducts it very well, too. But it was never an opera for Covent Garden. Perhaps in those days there were few people, even French people, who understood how to sing it. The speaking voice did not seem to carry in that vast house, and almost all the singers made the fatal mistake of singing the opera as if it were Massenet, Mme. Edvina does so still. Otherwise, if she could only learn to speak clearly without effort, she would be an ideal Mélisande. How essential good speaking is to the opera was demonstrated in a very wonderful way by some of the other singers, notably M. Maguenat, who took the part of Pelléas. For Debussy differentiates his characters by the tempo of their speech. More than that, he achieves his dramatic climax by a very subtle gradation of speed. It is so slow, so gradual, that for the first two acts one barely notices it. And to make it perceptible in

MODIFIED RAPTURE

Aldwych Theatre.—"Nono." By Sacha Guitry.

It must be confessed that a French company appearing in London has always something of a walk-over. There is not the least danger, to begin with, that its real merits, whatever they are, will miss their due appreciation owing to any latent mistrust or jealousy of the "foreigner"; that particular feature of our theatrical tradition has happily entirely vanished. Next, a French company, besides its intrinsic merits, has the advantage of being a change. Its good points are not only good, but, except to those who go often to France, they are new. We do not, most of us, see enough French acting for it to lose its freshness. Hence a temptation to be just a little more pleased by it than scrupulous critics ought to be. This is inevitable, and not too serious an evil. What really is a serious evil, and upsetting to criticism, is a certain factitious enthusiasm for French ways which always declares itself when a Parisian success is brought over here. The impulse to let people see as ostentatiously as possible that you really do appreciate these things (these naughty things) in all their subtlety is—to put it in a phrase as close to the feelings of those of whom we complain—a kind of snobism that is far too prevalent. It is not good for those who indulge in it, nor is it good for those who are supposed to be honoured by it. How are we to find terms in which to praise M. Sacha Guitry when he gives us something remarkable if we are expected to go into ecstasies when he shows us things that are as ordinary as can be?

For "Nono" is ordinary; just an ordinary French comedy of intrigue, almost a farce. There are the conventional puppets of the genre—carved a little more delicately, painted a little more ingeniously, if you will—elderly and boring mistress, young and butterfly mistress, elderly and disabused amoret, young and inexhaustive lovers. Even the manservant and the chambermaid, with some extra virtuosity in their viciousness, are there to fill in the background according to rule. To find even cynicism in the crisis-cross of their dealings is preposterous; you might as well find "pity and terror" (as the youthful Mr. Gosse did) in Punch and Judy. You can only hope that the dialogue may scintillate, and even here the flashes were intermittent. That jest, for instance, which carried so much of the last half of the play on its shoulders, about Robert's obligation to return to Jacques either his mistress or the 4,000 francs which Jacques has been innocently paying for her upkeep, with which he has been deceiving him with his friend, would not, we think, have afforded such infinite pleasure had one of our best English dramatists risen to the height of conceiving it. It is not any wittier really when spoken in French.

Is M. Guity himself as pleased with it now as he was when he wrote this work at the age of sixteen?

When we turn from the play to the acting there is need of uncomfortable reserves. M. Guity as the insouciant, insouciant Robert carries it off so easily and breezily that it seems almost hypercritical to hint that somewhere about the middle of the third act his technique showed signs of exhaustion, especially as to gesture, and that only the final curtain, on which the curtain is opening, and thereby spoiling, most of the touches that had charmed us during the opening stages of his performance. Mlle. Suzanne Avril, as the forsaken Madame Weiss, had not enough to do to place her in the same risky position, but she is so finished an artist that we feel sure she would have come through triumphantly in any case. And of Mlle. Yvonne Printemps the least we can say is that she did come through triumphantly. She so husbanded her slender material as the feather-brained Nono that she had always something fresh to offer. She builds not only on charm and cleverness, but on observation. She was Nono, and all that the class Nono stands for, in every shade of meaning that crossed her face (and what a gift of expression she has!), in every gesture, and in every step. In the spasm of laughter that shakes her suddenly, irrationally, in the third act, at some inconvenient reminiscence of her youth, she conveys by a momentary contortion of her body the whole psychology of courtiership. M. Guitry, we feel, has still his best in store for us, but it will be hard for Mlle. Printemps to surpass herself.

TOO CLEVER BY HALF

COMEDY THEATRE.—“Why Marry?”  By Jesse Lynch Williams.

WHY marry? John (whose surname is not on the programme and has unhappily escaped us) had a clear answer to give to the question. He had a large house, somewhere in the U.S.A., a larger estate, a huge business and a hardly won social status. If you were heretical on the subject of marriage, you were not respectable. If you were not respectable, you would be ostracized. If you became the scorn of your neighbours, and were cut by the best people, of what use was your house, your estate, your fortune? Would your money even be safe if you outraged the men with whom you had to deal, from whom you might reasonably hope to elicit marriage-portions for your female relatives? John, in short, was a social Realpolitiker.

His cousin Theodore was equally clear on the main issue. He was a clergyman and knew that you ought to marry. Unfortunately he could not tell why you ought to. Moreover he was sentimental and would not have you marry for money. He even threatened not to officiate at the wedding between John’s younger sister and a wealthy young libertine whom she had deftly snared, until he was reminded that it would be perfectly easy to cut off supplies from himself, his sick wife and his six needy children. He thereby (poor buffer-state!) earned the contempt of John’s other sister Helen, who worked as assistant in a laboratory and loved her professor, a brilliant young Galahad of the test-tube, but was resolved that if he wanted her she should have it without the mutual friction of married existence. To her brother this determination was a sentence of social extinction, and the struggle between him and Helen provided the stuff of a genuinely exciting contest.

For a time things came up to expectation. It was impossible not to admire the gesticulating, grimacing little cad adroitly played by Mr. A. E. George as he struck down his opponents one by one; gagged the priest with dollar-notes; terrified his wife, who showed a flash of rebellion, back into her normal hypocrisy; kept the family skeleton from the well-born heir whom his more dutiful sister had hooked, and stung Galahad himself into a desire to marry Helen and save her from further persecution. Nothing remained by the end but the stark opposition between Helen’s romantic idealism and his practical genius. Would he, we asked ourselves almost breathlessly, find a way of coercing or fooling her too? Or would he throw up the sponge, and, if so, what would he look like when defeated?

Alas! It was the author who threw up the sponge. The process of the battle had been much encumbered by a certain “Uncle Everett,” a Judge who hung about the house with a store of epigrams which Mr. Aubrey Smith’s finished comedy-style almost succeeded in palming off as real witticisms. After boring us intensely with a cock-and-bull tale of a divorce which he and his wife wanted and did not want, and finally decided not to have, the Judge took a hand in the game with the young people. He goaded Helen and her lover into some violent language testifying to their love for one another (“In the sight of God . . . my husband . . . my wife”), and then informed us that by the law of the State (or the Stage, it does not matter) they were married whether they liked it or not, by affirmation in the presence of witnesses. If the author had a trick like that up his sleeve, it was scarcely fair to interest us in his characters. Helen, who possessed, in Miss Rosa Lynd’s playing of her, so much biting American wit and self-assurance, would have had the direct reply to the Judge hoisted in her hearing. But it is no use arguing with a falling curtain; you can only record your grudge against the author.

MR. MASEFIELD AND OTHERS

WE are indebted to Miss Penelope Wheeler and the St. Martin-in-the-Fields Players for permitting us to gather that Mr. John Masefield’s playlet “The Locked Chest,” which, thirteen years after the writing of it, was published last year, acts considerably better than it reads. There is nothing in such a melodramatic trifle to indicate, as Mr. Masefield’s later work sometimes indicates, that his impulse has been, like that of his sea stories, the result of deliberate artistic struggle. His concern is wholly with technique; we see the mind of a young writer being disciplined by the form rather than the form by his mind. Nor can we avoid identifying the Icelandic action of a murderer’s escape from his pursuers, by means of a woman’s trickery, with the noisy bid for success which usually accompanies a dramatist’s failure to cope with a technical demand that is not merely for strict economy and concentration, but one which is stumbled on, as we feel Schnitzler and Synge stumbled on it, rather than the result of deliberate approach. But the St. Martin-in-the-Fields Company made a very lusty and enjoyable episode of the play, and their tendency toward over-acting will not prevent “The Locked Chest” from proving one of the most effective pieces in their repertory when they are able to commence in a theatre of their own.

The matinee performance given recently in the St. Martin’s Theatre by Miss Wheeler and her colleagues was an endeavour to gain public support for a movement in which they, a group of professional actors, intend to re-establish some sort of relation between the Church and the stage. So far as could be gathered from the remarks made during an interval by the Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, the relation will be extended to the poorer class of audience for preference, the players already presenting their repertory in halls in the East-End of London. The success of similar work at the Old Vic indicates the possibilities which lie ahead of the movement if it refrains from elaboration of presentment. And so far as there is no attempt to insist on the plays being didactic, it is a movement which compels the co-operation of everyone concerned for the widening of the appeal of art. The two plays given in addition to Mr. Masefield’s did not altogether escape the charge of didacticism. “Sir Palomides and the Holy Grail,” by Mr. Christopher Home, and “Michael,” Mr. Miles Malleson’s adaptation of Tolstoy’s “What Men Live By,” may not prove quite so puzzling to their allegorical consistency to working-class audiences as they did to the patrons of the matinée; but we should imagine that charming and graceful tableaux of saints and angels, and lengthy moralizing monologues, will, when the novelty of the work has worn away, make only an indifferent appeal to a class of playgoer which instinctively seeks for warm and rough-and-ready humanism.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It may be of interest to recall that, when dealing in 1914 with "The New Novel, Henry James remarked: "We feel it not to be the paradox it may at the first blush seem that the state of the novel in England at the present time is virally very much that of the state of criticism itself; and this moreover, at the risk perhaps of some added appearance of perverse remark, by the very reason that we see criticism so much in abeyance."

Criticism, as was pointed out in The Athenæum of the 7th inst., is fallen into contempt, and even in better days we have had in our English field but the scantest growth of any ability to pronounce with authority on our literature. We had, it is true, Matthew Arnold and Walter Pater, and we, had with us even later Henry James. The small extent to which we at present need to reckon with criticism has been forcibly shown us in the caperings over the grave of the last—I mean the reviews which have appeared concerning the recently published letters of Henry James. Reading them, I have been reminded of a story (I think by Mr. Wells) which recounted the adventure of a normal man lost in a country which contained a blind population. They regarded him (I remember it but vaguely) with great distrust, and finally determined to tolerate him only on condition that they removed by an operation the peculiar growths which made him different from and dangerous to themselves. Our reviewers have been busy about a similar operation, and have been similarly foiled of their purpose. Henry James is carried out of their reach by the peculiar possession of a genius which they sufficiently prove themselves as unable to see as to estimate.

Surely an opportunity has been missed of pointing out that the younger generation, if they can be induced to go back no further, might find in the study of the work and method of Henry James a way of salvation. One can scarcely, with the sense of our present sickness strong upon us, find any sterner discipline than the spectacle of this rare alliance of a vision and a technique alike magnificent, this march from achieved perfection to achieved perfection, with never a falter by the way.

Yours, etc.,

J. R.

JOANNES STRADANUS' "VESPUCCI LANDING IN AMERICA"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—Allow me to add the following information re "Vespucci Landing in America," respecting which some remarks were made in your issues of April 9 and May 7. The original drawing by Joannes Stradanus was produced in the second half of the sixteenth century in Florence, where this prolific artist lived for over fifty years. He had probably some then existing portrait of the famous Florentine navigator before him; but of all this full information will be found in my "Sport in Art" (Simpkins). I bought this extraordinarily interesting drawing many years ago from old Mr. Quaritch, and it is now (as part of my collection of over 4,000 drawings and prints on old sport) on exhibition in New York at the Anderson Galleries.

Then there is the engraving after this drawing made in the last decade of the sixteenth century by one of the celebrated Antwerp family of engravers, Galle, and it forms the first plate in that most curious series of twenty prints called the "Nova Reperta," dealing with various inventions, the discovery of America being given the place of honour. It is a costly series and difficult to find complete, even the Museum Print Room lacking a complete set, though the Victoria and Albert Museum has one. In the Commaissor of last September I published a slightly reduced reproduction of the print as a whole, while Quaritch's "First Four Voyages" (1892) gives but a portion, viz., the central figures. Lot 57 in the Philippis Collection sold June 24, 1919, was the earliest xylographic representation of anything relating to America, and (older by some 60 or 70 years) probably suggested the motive to Stradanus. Being a unique woodcut, it fetched very nearly £500 (480), and it has also, I believe, crossed the Atlantic to find a home in a well-known transatlantic collection.

1 shall be glad if you can find space for these brief notes.

Yours faithfully,

MUSIC AND ITS INFLUENCE

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—M. B.'s remarks are interesting and misleading.

The paragraph from Havelock Ellis is indeed testimony to the power of Beethoven's music, but in asserting that Beethoven's music is his autobiography M. B. certainly does not prove Beethoven's mastershhip. Mastership implies more than the subjectivity of lyricism.

M. B. writes also: "After all, what is the result of the former [i.e., dramatic music] but a momentarily aesthetic exhalation as opposed to the soul-scoring and uplifting influence of the latter [i.e., the works of a master of music]?"

"Aesthetic exhalation" is a term dangerously misused here. It should mean the highest effect which art can produce in the mind, but M. B. refers to the sensuous satisfaction of popular phrases and rhythms in music. That kind of pleasure is as legitimate (or illegitimate) as the pleasure derived from sugar, tobacco, fashions in dress, perfumed soap, and kissing. There may be an element of pure beauty in any of these, just as there is in the cheapest melody, but our perception of it does not arise from sensations pleasant or otherwise. Professor Santayana's definition of beauty as "objectified pleasure" is very much closer to the truth, and Kant appears to have said the last word about aesthetic appreciation when he insisted that aesthetic pleasure was neither sensuous nor moral, and arose from the free play of imagination and understanding.

Sincerely,
446, Camden Road, N.7.

LAMARTINE

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Sainte-Beuve's dictum to Matthew Arnold on Lamartine ("He was important to us"), to which M. Charles Du Bos refers in your issue of May 7, was quoted by Arnold in an essay on "The French Play in London," which first appeared in the Nineteenth Century for August, 1879 (vol. vi. pp. 228-43). The essay was reprinted with Arnold's "Irish Essays" (1882), and may be found in vol. xi. (pp. 200 foll.) of the complete edition of his works (Macmillan, 1904-5). The sentence is cited with a difference ("is... was") in Mr. Saunders's article on Lamartine in the current edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica." It may, however, for aught I know, occur elsewhere in Arnold's works.

May I comment on another matter in M. Du Bos' article? The line from "Le Golfe de Baïa" that he especially praises:

Le silence occupe les airs—might perhaps be accepted as a poet's evidence in considering the delightful and wholly venial syntactic ambiguity of Gray's line:

And all the air a solemn stillness holds.

Each poet is describing how still evening came on. I may add that my old Lamartine (1834) personifies "silence" with a capital S.

Yours truly,

May 10, 1920.

O. H. E.

P.S.—In the chapter on "Les Médiations" in René Dounis's Lamartine monograph "l'éloge de Gray. "Sur un cintre de campagne," imité par Fontanes dans "le Jour des Morts" [1785]," is expressly mentioned as contributing to the atmosphere in which "Les Méditations" were produced.

We are informed by Mr. Humphrey Milford that "Wagner's Dramas and Greek Tragedy," reviewed in The Athenæum last week, is published in England by the Oxford University Press for the Columbia University Press.
and Berber that survived, still speaking Punic, down to the end of the Roman imperial period; and M. Gsell acutely observes that the speedy adoption of the Arabic tongue after the Moslem conquest was no doubt due to the similarity of the invading tongue to that which the Carthaginians, whom Rome had destroyed seven centuries and more before, had in the course of the seven preceding centuries of their empire deeply rooted in the soil of Africa. M. Gsell also traces the speedy African victory of Christianity in earlier days to the Semitic character of the religion of the land. The Liby-Phoenician never took kindly to the gods of Greece or the so-called gods of Rome. That Tanit Pnê-Balâ (“the face of Baal”: we do not know why M. Gsell so definitely rejects the theory that makes this “face” that of the full moon; it seems probable enough), the Tanît, or goddess, of the “New City” (Qurt-hadasht), whom all worshipped in Africa, would easily be identified with the Mother of our Lord, we can see.

Carthage was uninteresting, but she was not without character by any means, and she could impress this character on the weaker-minded Libyans. But the wit of Greece and the strength of Rome (how much of her easy domination of the Greeks may not Rome owe to a Cynic’s observation that “they are not faithful and passionate relics are the dullest and least interesting in the world.” In the British Museum may be seen a row of the miserable funerary stele, with their mixture of poor imitations of Greek artistic motives with the clumsy emblems of the Phoenician gods, which represent for us the art of the city of the Magonids and the Barca, the city that sent forth Hannibal from Spain over the Alps to Canne, and all but destroyed Rome. More recent excavations on the spot in the necropoles of Carthage have hardly produced anything better. Of temples, palaces, great works of art, even of imported Greek art, nothing survives. There must have been something better than the rubbish that as yet has been found. Still, there may not have been much. The Phoenicians themselves at home had no art of their own. They never originated anything, never were anything more than bad and cheap copyists of others. The references in classical authors give us no hint that any great critical production of the human mind ever issued from Carthage. As M. Gsell observes, the Magonian treatise on agriculture, which was rescued for use as a text-book in Italy, is poor stuff; and the Periplo of Hanno a dull production. Great men Carthage had, men of energy, such as Hannibal. Yet they failed. There was something rotten in the state of Carthage that condemned her to stave.

M. Gsell’s “Histoire” is a chronicle of sterility. This fourth volume alone contains more than 500 pages; the three that preceded it are also important tomes. It is a chronicle of the jejune, the dull, and the uninteresting, and a record of the unknown. M. Gsell proposes question after question: What did the Carthaginians know about this? what did they do about that? The answer is, we have no idea. We only get the impression that whatever they knew or did about this or that matter in question would have been extremely uninteresting and hardly worth knowing. And only a certain amount of this ignorance can be due to Roman destruction. In Sicily, where we know them from Greek sources, the Carthaginians never could carry out what ought to have been easy enough, with their material power, had they had the kind of brains that were needed. Like the three sons of Gama, “On the whole they were Not intelligent.” Hannibal remains the one great exception to the rule. Yet in Africa they succeeded, probably more by vis inerzia than by active and intelligent policy, in creating a Liby-Phoenician population, a combination of Semite that what we do know is as dull and uninteresting as it possibly be. But that is the fault of the Carthaginians, not of M. Gsell.

The book suffers, so far as the general reader is concerned, from its total lack of illustrations. In England such a book could not be published without illustrations; nobody but a few savants would look at it. But in France they still preserve much of the old-fashioned grand style in these matters, which ignores illustration as an unworthy ancillary to the argument; the mind must apprehend the author's meaning through the medium of his logical and precise language alone. Happily there is a real index, not a useless "Table des matières."

DIX-NEUF PoêMES ELASTIQUES. By Blaise Cendrars. (Paris, Au

DU MONDE ENTIER. By Blaise Cendrars. (Paris, Nouvelle Revue Française. 6fr.)

M.

SOUPAULT is on his guard against saying anything too significant. He does not want to be taken for one of those absurdly earnest folk who strike philosophic attitudes in the face of life or who take human emotions seriously. He presents us in his volume with his sensations and impressions in their native purity, uncontaminated, as far as it is possible, with the faintest tinge of thought. His technique may be a little unfamiliar at first:

le train passe
— c'est un nuage

déménagements pour tous pays à l'entresol cinq heures le vent part En voiture:

but it is not difficult to see the connection of these phrases with the title of the poem from which they are quoted, "La Grande Mélancolie d'une Avenue." We recognize here a more "advanced" and coherent form of what our novelists call psychology ("There was a hole in the curtain. She noticed it for the first time. It was shaped like an iguana's head. It became an obsession..." and so on). The novelists go on in this vein for three hundred pages. We are grateful to M. Soupault for his self-restraint in writing no poem more than a hundred words long.

"Lampes à Arc" is the 1920 version of "Poèmes Arystophanesques." Laurent Tailhade celebrated his "ancien bandagiste," his "ioures au nez circonflexe" in exquisite quatorzains. It is in vers libre that M. Morand sings of his motor-load of Spaniards:

Sur les strapontins trois filles maures, poids lourds,
avec un ducot sous lequel tref de bouche, avec un sourcil sous lequel tref d'yeux baignant dans une eau bleue.
Au fond il y a le fils de famille sans menton, avec, en pase de nez,
ung carre de drap noir.

M. Morand has a good share of that verbal wit which makes the "Poèmes Aristophanesques" such good reading. Phrases like "les cactus orthopédiques" remain, a constant source of amusement, in the memory. On the whole, however, we prefer M. Tailhade's quatorzains to the "Lampes à Arc." You can get more epigrammatic point into a sonnet than into a loose-knit piece of free verse.
Furthermore, by using the sonnet M. Tailhade could produce comic overtones, suggestions of parody and literary criticism, which cannot be got out of a form that has not been hallowed by a long and noble tradition.

The two volumes of M. Blaise Cendrars contain some of the best work that is being done by the younger French poets. His prose poem "J'ai tué," which was noticed in The Athenæum last year, was an only partially successful tour de force. "Du Monde Entier" and "Dix-neuf Poêmes Elastiques" show him at his best. Unlike M.
Soupault and his collaborators in the various little journals in which he is interested, Blaise Cendrars has something to write about. He has travelled from China to Peru, and the whole world, as it passes in a perpetually changing panorama before his eyes, is the theme of his poetry. He is a Romantic in his liking for the picturesque, for the lavish beauty of the earth: a Romantic, too, in his willingness to talk about his own emotions.

On a beau ne pas vouloir parler de soi-même
Il faut parfois crier.

It is just because he is prepared to cry out, without caring if he makes a fool of himself, it is just because he is not affected with that over-refinement and that morbid self-consciousness which prevent so many of his younger contemporaries from writing about anything serious at all, that M. Cendrars is a poet whom it is possible to read with pleasure and interest.

YOUTH'S BURDEN

LE POIDS DU PASSÉ. Par Marguerite Regnault. (Paris, Calmann-Levy. 4fr. 90.)

The times being what they are, one might expect from a book with such a title as this a new proof of the growing sense of revolt against the "vested interests" of tradition and society. But the note of this book is sacrifice, not revolt.
It is the story of a girl who from childhood devotes her life, first to her mother, then to her death to her weak and dissolve father and her little brother. For them she gives up her career as a pianist which seemed to offer success and happiness; for them, later on, she renounces the fiancé—a German, by the way, for which the author makes apology in the preface—who desires to carry her away and leave the wretched widower and his five-year-old son to shift for themselves.

But for the coming and the passing of Herrmann Vogel, the book contains no plot. It is a study in the development of a girl's character—of, we are thankful to record, the character of a reasonably normal girl, and not one of the tiresome "Futurist" children who, having peopleed books for some years, are beginning to step forth into real life with distressing frequency. But it belongs in type to those very modern studies in childish psychology which were first made fashionable by "Marie Claire," as such a study it is in every way admirable, and can be recommended with confidence to lovers of this kind of fare. For ourselves, we confess to a liking for meat over more highly seasoned, whether it be with incident or emotion. But perhaps our palate is jaded.

It is all very clever and very delicate, but even within its own bounds it seems to lack something of power and precision. Ninette displays a weakness and irresolution that do not seem to accord well with genius, so that we begin to wonder whether her music would in fact have brought the triumphs she expected. And Herrmann Vogel, surely he becomes too swiftly the "German," the enemy, after having been the perfect lover of a girl's fancy? The author tells us that this book was written before the war, but we wonder whether, perhaps even in the proof-reading, one or two deft touches were not added to paint him a true representative of his nation and, incidentally, to make it harder to understand Ninette's heart-break at his loss.

The second volume of the "Catáleg de la Col·lecció Cervantina formada per D. Isidro Bonsoms i Sicart" (Barcelona, 1919, 30 pesetas), of which the first volume appeared in 1916, carries this important list of works by and about Cervantes from 1801 to 1879. It catalogues and comments upon nearly 500 volumes (nos. 400-1172). A third volume will include the works from 1880 to 1916, and finish this catalogue.
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding to the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-divisions being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Works in this List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, MAGAZINES.

Boe (P. N.) and Moreno (H. W. B.), A Hundred Years of the Bengali Press: being a history of the Bengali newspapers from their inception to the present day. Calcutta, H. B. Moreno, Central Press, Wellesley Street, 1920, 6° in. 130 pp. paper. 79

No small number of English writers should be interested by this account of Bengali journalism. The first journal in Bengali, the Bengal Gazette, was established in 1816, according to the authors, by a Brahman, Gangadhar Bhattacharji. Among the papers included is the Bharati, founded in 1877 by Jotindra, a brother of Rabindra Nath Tagore. 'It has taken a hundred years,' say the authors, 'to consolidate Bengali journalism... There is still a great deal to be done... the Vernacular Press... must cease merely to criticize without helpful suggestions.' The authors state that this is a growing tendency among the vernacular journals.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

La Motte (Ellen N.). The Opium Monopoly. New York, Macmillan Co., 1920. 8 in. 104 pp. paper, $1. 178.8

This is a violent, but unfortunately not baseless indictment of the 'British Empire's trade in opium.' America, it seems, menaced with the drug habit, and to obtain the means of satisfying it by way of Canada or Mexico will be perilously easy. National pharisaism and a strong anti-English feeling are a conspicuous part of the writer's equipment, but the facts which she adduces must give us to think.

This treatise, expressed in highly technical terms, is intended for professional students of philosophy rather than for the general public. The author acknowledges his obligation to Dr. Schiller for criticism and suggestions; but that lucid and arresting style which he wishes "America" to consolidate Bengali journalism... a popular book scarcely ranks among communicable gifts, and any trace of it would be vainly sought for here.

200 RELIGION.

This difficult and perennially fascinating subject is treated by Professor Peake in scholarly, but also in simple and interesting fashion. On the perplexing question of the date and place of the tradition in question, the author has the courage to confess himself undecided; but on the whole he thinks that the Apocalypse, though written during the reign of Nero, appeared first under Domitian, and that it is not by the author of the Fourth Gospel, but by the son of Zebedee.

This little volume contains, we are told, Dr. Sandy's "last public utterances as Lady Margaret Professor... but not, we trust, his last contribution to the story of Biblical criticism. He seems here to suggest that his delightful books dealing with the Fourth Gospel have been in part founded on a mistaken hypothesis. We are also assured that he goes so far as to re-assert his belief in a broad distinction between miracles of healing, now generally recognized as humanly possible, and the so-called "nature-miracles," on which Science has so far bestowed no official sanction. His inspiring faith in a divine plan, clearly traceable through the course of history, has survived even the ordeal of the war.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

These criticisms of the new Italian military law come from the general who commanded at Caporetto. He considers that Italy is now in no danger of surprise attacks by her neighbours. In other quarters she will have the help of the League of Nations. Hence there is no need for an army of the size contemplated by the new law. Whether the number of officers proposed is out of all proportion to the nation's needs. Moreover, the authorities are making the mistake of relying too much on the professional element, which will give the country an elaborate organization, but a poorly equipped force. General Capello pays a warm tribute to the valuable work done by the citizen soldier of all ranks, and would prefer to see a force organized more on the Swiss model. Soluci, who served on General Capello's staff, testifies to the seriousness of his illness at the time of the disaster, which he considers to have been his misfortune rather than his fault.

Parry (A. W.). Education in England in the Middle Ages. University Tutorial Press, 1920. 7½ in. 272 pp. 4s. 6d. (bibl.) index, 7s. 6d. 3422

Elementary English education begins, in Mr. Parry's opinion, with the charity schools in the seventeenth century; but from the Anglo-Saxon period onwards he finds traces of an educational system, designed primarily as a preparation for Holy Orders or for the monastic life, yet extending to individuals in every social rank. The subjects taught seem to have been reading (Latin) and singing (with a view to public worship). Writing, as a difficult art (we know that it was so considered even in Hannah More's time), would only be learned exceptionally. As regards the nursery schools for gentlemen's daughters, and the small number of pupils who attended them, the natural inference would appear to be that girls not attending them (in other words, the great majority) received no instruction whatever. Mr. Parry says little of the early Benedictine nuns, the earliest class of recognized female teachers, as we think, in the world's history. In love of learning they were not far behind the monks. Henry I's queen owed it to her convent training that she had read not only Jerome, but Cicero, and could conduct correspondence in Latin.

This book, by the Professor of Economics at New York University, is restricted to a discussion of principles—hence the title. Intended to prepare the mind of the student for the contents of more advanced and specialized treatises, Professor Turner's work is a clear exposition of fundamentals associated with essential institutions, as well as of such subjects as price, value, supply, money, banking, rent, capital and others. The concluding pages deal with corporations, monopoly, and trust legislation.

O'Grady (Hardress) and Catty (Nancy). The Early Stages of Spoken and Written English ('Handbooks in the Art of Teaching'), Constable [1920]. 7½ in. 618 pp. 4s. 6d. 144.4

Apparently, the Board of Education does not see eye to eye with those who would apply the science of phonetics to teaching English. The authors even wonder whether the moderate zeal shown by the Board towards the extirpation of dialects is due to a "reactionary desire to keep distinct the classes of a regard for the Utopian ideal, that speakers should retain the English racy of their soil and also be masters of "Standard Received English," they think that local peculiarities must go. The book is an instructive manual on teaching to read and training in verbal expression, and gives valuable hints on method.

An English Grammar, being one of a series of books for Serbs in the Latin script issued by the Clarendon Press. It is arranged by parts of speech, and planned for use with the English Reader by the same authors. English students with a slight knowledge of Slav will also derive much profit from it, not least from the phonetic transcripts of their own language.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Fifty years have passed since most of the events recorded in this volume were new (for this railway was thirty years in the planning, though only six in the making). The writer tells, vividly and in sufficient detail, how this "wonder of its age" came into being—"the stress, the soil, the toil of mind and body which overcame the physical difficulties."

With admirable clarity the author discusses the principle of State sovereignty over the air, and the opposite principle of free circulation; the problems concerned in the nationality and registration of aircraft; the formalities to be observed by the international aviator; the certification of aircraft and pilots, and numerous other subjects. Every flyer should possess the knowledge embodied in Dr. Spaighl's pages.

780 MUSIC.

The second edition, revised and enlarged, of the Rev. W. Meredith Morris's excellent dictionary. The first edition, which appeared in 1904, has been out of print for some time.

Smith (Charles T.). THE MUSIC OF LIFE: education for leisure and culture; with curricula evolved by experiment in an elementary school. King, 1919. 8 1/2 in. 150 pp. boards, 4/ 6 n.

In this second edition there do not appear to be many alterations. The object is to show how the elementary school curriculum can civilize by eliminating those sordid factors and opportunities for vice that produce unhappy, demoralized, and embittered citizens. To this end the teaching of music, folk-dancing, and literature can be made an efficient means. The musical examples (see, for instance, p. 101) might be much more clearly reproduced.

800 LITERATURE.

Most of the selections are from the first two-thirds of the "Mémoires," and are passages illustrating the declining splendour of the reign of Louis XIV. The Roi Soleil and Mme. de Maintenon are presented in their daily life; and after the longer pieces come a series of portraits illustrating the incisiveness of Saint-Simon's pen. A full historical introduction, a few notes, and two appendices form the apparaits criticus.

Opening with Michelet on Jeanne d'Arc, and closing with General Pétain's ordre du jour of November 18, 1918, this selection is particularly rich in pieces sacred to the glory of French history. Forssoart, Des Périers, Marot and Louise Labé are also among the writers represented; and, apart from the high literary interest of the contents, the reason for the particular order of the arrangement may please the reader with some mental exercise.

These essays, most of which appeared in Everyman, although containing no particularly new ideas, are readily and brightly written. They consist of agreeable comment on questions of the day, written from a "moderate" point of view.

POETRY.

MacKaye (Percy) and Barnhart (Harry), THE WILL OF SONG: a dramatic service of community singing. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 70 pp. app., 70c.

"How," Mr. MacKaye inquires, "how may the surging Tides of Man be sluiced in Conduits of Art, without losing their primal glory and momentum?" The answer to this enigma is contained in the present volume. The "Will of Song" was composed for "community singing" by the inhabitants of the Oranges and Bufallo. At a "Community Sing" the audience—call it the congregation, for the Community Sing is a service in the religion of Democracy—participates in the performance—is, indeed, itself an actor, a Group Person. The Will of Song is a very adequate expression of that idealism, none the less uplifting for being a little vague, which stars not only in America, but also among most earnest believers in democracy elsewhere.

Mirlees (Hope). PARIS. Hogarth Press, 1920. 6 in. 23 pp. paper, 8/ n.

In singing the praises of Paris, Miss Mirlees has adopted the idiom of the younger French poets—not the "youngest" of all, but those who stand between Dada and the Nouvelle Revue Française. It is the idiom, roughly speaking, of M. Sina in "Prikaz," of M. Cendrars in "Du Monde Entier," of M. Drieu La Rochelle in his later manner. "Paris" is immensely literary and immensely accomplished. One reads it with pleasure and interest, admiring the author's learning and wit, and the skill with which the verse is handled:

The sky is apricot;
Against it there is purple
Across the Pont Solférino
Pikes nibbling the celestial apricot—
That one with broad-trimmed hat and tipped pelisse must be a priest.

They are black and two-dimensional, and look like silhouettes of Louis-Philippe citizens.

These lines illustrate Miss Mirlees' qualities and defects—her clear, witty vision, and the quite superfluous pedantry which so often comes shutting down, heavily and darkly, across it.

Soupault (Philippe). ROSE DES VENTS. Paris, Au Sans Pareil, 1920. 7 1/2 in. 56 pp. ill. paper, 3fr. 50.

See review, p. 684.

Three poets are represented in this number of the Chapbook, namely, Eugene Webster, John Redwood Anderson and A. E. Coppard. Miss Webster is so technically accomplished that one finds it very difficult to say what is the real merit of her poems. "Betty" and "Death of a Child* are the best of her six pieces. Mr. Anderson is represented by a series of nine poems on "October Fair-time." He treats the clowns and merry-go-rounds, swings and freaks—objects so much beloved by the poets of the advance guard—in a large, picturesque, romantic style, brought superficially up to date by a small admixture of Edith Sitwellism. Of the three poets we like best, Mr. A. E. Coppard, whose work gives tokens of a curious intensity of emotion and sensuous appreciation:

The huge uprearing sky has a million lures—
The wind confuses at its coy mischief—
Dust is gone up on curtains of visible air—
The unrelenting elm is passionately tossed—
And seven pale doves are thrown like stars—
Under the black cloud.

FICTION.

An unreal story of a doctor who takes on his shoulders the sins and the evil name of his diasopianiac half-brother, a feeble-minded missionary, and a self-sacrificing woman who loves the former, but marries the latter to complete his reformation. The scene is a settlement on the Congo.

Cobb (Thomas). MR. PRESTON'S DAUGHTER. Lane, 1920. 71 in. 285 pp., 7 n.

A story of a woman's unfounded suspicions and jealousy. The heroine, Monica Dasant, suspects her lover of wavering affection, and believes that her rival is the vulgar and frivolous Esa Maynard, whose antecedents have been chequered. The secrecy of Esa's past is maintained until the last pages, in which the skein of complexity is finally unravelled.

Grant (Graham). THE DIARY OF A POLICE SURGEON. Pearson, 1920. 71 in. 188 pp., 3, 6 n.

These cameos-stories and sketches, constructed out of episodes in the experiences of a police surgeon in the East End of London, deal with fights, stabbings, murder, theft, disease and the like. The notorious affair at Sidney Street is described in one of the tales. A Practical Joker" has some light touches; and "Dan and Nellie Brown" is a sad little story.

As a whole the book will scarcely be attractively readable, except to those who have a liking for realistic details of sordid crime.

Hendryx (James B.). THE GOLD GIRL. Putnam, 1920. 71 in. 349 pp., 7, 6 n. 813.5

The background of this bright and interesting story is Montana, where the father of the heroine, Patty Sinclair, "made a strike of gold" shortly before his death. But he neglected to file the claim; and Patty, with the aid of a somewhat cryptic map, sets to work to locate the reef. She is nearly caught in the toils of two unscrupulous rival in the search; but, befriended throughout by "Vil" Holland, a rough but estimable cowboy, Patty is ultimately successful in discovering her father's "strike," and in the concluding chapter she marries "Vil.".

Julian Hunter, soldier poet, has corn ripe hair and the proboscis of a Greek god or an advertisement for collars. Being a poet, he addresses young ladies in such terms as these: "Where is thy Court, Titania?" or "My dainty goddess Freia. Contrary to expectation, the heroine does not marry him. "Julian, I tell you, you are in love with me, you are in love with Life. You need no sweetheart, for your Sweetheart is the World." Prudently, she chooses the proffered hand of Mr. Winston, who makes munitions. Selections from Julian Hunter's poems as well as black-and-white illustrations enliven the book.

* Bland (J. O. P.). MEN, MANNERS, AND MODELS IN SOUTH AMERICA. Heinemann, 1920. 9 in. 327 pp. il. index, 12, 6

The author of this vivacious and gracefully-written book protests with justice against the "Blue-book stodginess" of many works which deal with that portion of the Western hemisphere south of the equator. It is undeniable that the general reader wants, not dry particulars of South American trades, industries, and manufacturing possibilities, but silhouettes of the men and women and their social life; descriptions of the prairies and forests, of mountain gorges and the everlasting hills." Mr. Bland, who portrays numerous types of South American life, vividly describes the places he has visited, successfully avoids the faults to which his stricture applies. His book is heartily to be commended.

A description of Aurès in Eastern Algeria, a region on the threshold of the desert, full of mountains, torrents, and forests, and so little known that even the Algerian on hearing the name has to look it up in the atlas. The author tells the story of its people, and describes its primitive village life, adding chapters on Tunis, a Tunisian marriage, and the women of Tunis.

Treloar (Sir William Purdie). A LORD MAYOR'S DIARY, 1900-7: to which is added the Official Diary of Micahah Ferry, Lord Mayor, 1738-9. Murray, 1920. 81 in. 281 pp. il., il. por., 10, 6 n. 920

One of the principal reasons why the unconventional Lord Mayor who in 1906-7 filled the civic chair with conspicuous success had wished to become chief magistrate was that "the position might enable him to do something permanently to benefit the little crippled children of the Metropolis." During his mayoralty Sir William Treloar founded the Cripples' Hospital and College at Alton, the welfare of which was, and remains, very near his heart; he received numerous royal and other distinguished persons at the Guildhall; danced the "Furry" dance in the streets of Ledet; and, with considerable éclat visited Berlin and Potsdam in a ticklish period in the history of the relations of this country with Germany. Sir William's description of Lord Mayor's day—which might be called "Impressions of 'Der Tag' from the City State Coach"—is vivid. The diary leaves the impression that "Lord Mayor" is synonymous with "hard worker"; and in the mayoral seat there seems to be much dignity, but not a large amount of ease. The eighteenth-century Lord Mayor's diary (the only previous record by a Lord Mayor of his year of office) is held reading by comparison with Sir William Treloar's chronicle.

930-990 HISTORY.

The author deals at considerable length, and in a facile, pleasant manner, with the bellicose aspirations of Germany, and the eternal conflict between Church and State, and the latter as exemplified in the revolt of Republican France against the alien or Papal direction of schools, in the Italian struggle for liberty of conscience, and the Kulturkampf between Wilhelm the Invincible and Pius the Infidel. The new States of Bohemia and Poland, says Mr. Biglow, have yet that fight before them. The author is far from hopeful in relation to the pacific intentions of Germany: “Prussia must be made harmless if the world is to be made safe; and Prussia will stay harmless just so long as she is compelled to—and no longer.”

Lock (H. O.). The Conquerors of Palestine through Forty Centuries. With an introduction by Field-Marshal Viscount Allenby. Scott, 1920. 9 in. 131 pp. map, apps. (bibllog.) index, 7/6 n. 933 and 956.9

Major Lock usefully and clearly summarizes the history of the military operations which have been carried out in Palestine from the era antecedent to the time of the Pharaoh, down to the red-letter day when the distinguished write, of the introduction, accompanied by his victorious army quietly and modestly entered Jerusalem. The Egyptians Assyrians, Jews, Babylonians, Medes and Persians, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, Crusaders, Saracens, Ottomans, Mamelukes, as well as the French and British, pass in succession across Major Lock’s crowded stage.

Mr. Millard discusses at great length the real character of Japan, the policy of the Japanese in the war, the Japanese diplomatic demands upon China in 1905, the Siberian question, and numerous other topics. The author sympathizes with China’s appeal to the democracies, and declares that American financial policy in China must keep free from association with Japanese business methods and political aspirations as they have been revealed in recent years.

The impact of Western forces upon the East has had two different motives: commercial and political, moral and religious. Professor Moore describes the influence of Greater Europe on the rest of the world, and endeavours to trace the results in the life of practically all non-European peoples. “The movement began in being a conquest, or at least an attempted one, and it continued in being an exploitation of the weaker by the stronger for the purposes of trade. It cannot be described as a vast and complex assimilation leading to the standard of the West which is evidenced in every phase of Eastern life.” He describes the process of assimilation in the departments of civil life and government, in economic relations, and in education and morals. As to the reflex action of the East, in no aspect of life, he says, has that been more profoundly felt than in religion.

Stevenson (John). Two Centuries of Life in Down, 1680-1880. Belfast, McCraw, Stevenson & Ott; Dublin, Hodges & O’Gog, 1920. 9 in. 516 pp. il. pors. maps, index, 21/ n. 941.56-7

The author tells the story of the first successful Plantation in Ireland, and of the life led by its settlers and their descendants. The scene is the territory in North Down granted by King James I. to James Hamilton and Hugh Montgomery. The period covered begins with the arrival of the adventurers in 1605-6, and ends at the dawn of the industrial era in the first decade of the nineteenth century. The numerous portraits add considerably to the interest of this informative book.

An arresting book in which the authors survey the post-war situation as a whole. They deal with the “Balkanization of Europe,” “The New Balance of Power,” “The Meaning of Bolshevism,” and the like. The picture painted is gloomy. In the period since the Armistice, there were no less than twenty-five wars going on in Central and Eastern Europe.” “There was hardly a country in Europe, on whichever side it had fought—or even if it had not fought at all—where deep-seated resentments and grievances had not been sown.” The class war which succeeded the national war now became local political war for the first time since 1848, and on an infinitely greater scale.” “The excesses of Russian Communism were exploited to create a popular bogey, in order that this in its turn might be used to discredit all forms of Socialism . . . Bolshevist’ became as opprobrious a nickname as ‘pro-German’ had been during the war.” If we have estimated the situation rightly, it becomes evident that the emergency with which we are faced is one of a much longer duration than five years.” These brief extracts will serve to illustrate the authors’ views and conclusions.

Reviewing German policy and dealings, Mr. Dane shows that in 1885 and 1890 the German diplomats agreed that it was the duty of the Powers to preserve the native races of Africa and to protect them from slavery and oppression; but he concludes that German rule in Africa portended a revival of chattel slavery on a great scale, and that this would not have been confined to the German continent. Happily, he says, the evil was rooted up. A harrowing account of the German treatment of the brave Hereros is given. The last section of the book is devoted to the war in the Pacific and the siege of Kiaochau.

This extremely painful statement of Mr. Forder is valuable as a record of personal experience at the hands of the Turks during the war. The author, who was a missionary among the tribes of the Arabian desert for twenty-five years, had the misfortune to be imprisoned by the Turkish authorities for four years without adequate trial. The life within the prison was unbelievably horrible and inhuman. Even of all descriptions, tainted with every kind of disease, were herded together so closely that there was barely room to lie down; certain prisoners went altogether foodless, and the rest were kept in a state of semi-starvation—unless there were friends outside to augment the daily ration. The story of the arrival of Mr. Forder’s wife in Damascus after a long separation from her husband, of her death from privation, and of his own survival, both in faith and body, makes sad but heroic reading.

*Hardie (Martin) and Allen (H. Warner). Our Italian Front. Painted by Martin Hardie; described by Warner Allen. Black, 1920. 9 in. 203 pp. il. (50 plates in colour), map, 25/ n. 940.345

The white or tinted houses, broad piazzas, and shady arcades of Italian cities, the ruined churches on both banks of the Po, and the rich colouring of the Italian mountains are vividly brought before the reader by Capt. Hardie’s very effective illustrations. Mr. Allen’s text is eminently readable, and the story is told with unswerving humanity. Even of all the Italian campaigns in the great war. It describes the experiences of the British Expeditionary Force from the moment of its arrival in a country which had never before seen a British army, down to the final and victorious offensive. The fifty illustrations are strikingly successful reproductions of Capt. Hardie’s water-colour drawings. The wrapper showing “The Street of the Arches, Arquata,” “Hills of Italy,” “The Colonel’s Washing,” and “In an Italian Village”—to name only a few of the pictures which adorn the volume—is particularly attractive.

WILLIAM BECKFORD

WILLIAM BECKFORD is a signal example of ill-starred genius. He did not go mad or die young; he did worse, he ossified, and is now almost forgotten, except as an eccentric. Yet “Ithakin” does not age: its date—it was begun six years before Byron was born—is as astonishing as the lies which Beckford told about it in his dotage. It is not true that he wrote it in three days and two nights at one sitting, or that he did not know who translated his French text. It took him more than a year to compose, and he gave the MS. to the Rev. William Henley to translate, the plan being that the French original and the English version should appear together. But Henley, disgusted with Beckford’s indolence and caprices, published his version without warning and with the statement that it was translated from the Arabic. This forced the infuriated author to publish the original; but he published it at Paris and Lausanne, and the French Venetian remained practically unknown until it was reprinted with an introduction by Mallarmé. The “Episodes,” again, missed fire. At the end of “Ithakin” the Caliph and Neurionihar listen to three stories from the lips of princes who, in the palace of Eblis, are awaiting the same punishment as themselves—the heart turned to flame and the extinction of all consciousness save that of remorse. Not until 126 years later was the world allowed to read these stories, and then only in a carelessly transcribed text and an incompetent translation. They deserve a better fate. Their theme is the same as that of “Ithakin”—the heart turned to flame and the extinction of all consciousness save that of remorse. Not until 126 years later was the world allowed to read these stories, and then only in a carelessly transcribed text and an incompetent translation. They deserve a better fate. Their theme is the same as that of “Ithakin” persistence in complicated depravity; and the method is the same—the Voltairean Eastern tale, transformed by an imagination once sensuous and romantic, while the cynicism is preserved and even heightened. Beckford wanted to print them during his lifetime, but, being rich, he held out for extravagant terms.

Very rich young men often enjoy the sense of having exhausted the whole circle of human experience; often, again, they have been romantic, especially in the eighteenth century. In Beckford the combination of wealth, cynicism and romance was unique: the wealth was fabulous, the cynicism made Lockhart tremble, the romance had the force of hallucination. His father the Alderman left him a million in ready money and an income computed at £110,000 a year. On his mother’s side (she was a Hamilton) he was of noble, even of royal descent. He was more than the usual young miller making the grand tour with his tutors and his doctor, paying his compliments to Voltaire and Madame de Stael and sending home rhapsodies on Swiss scenery. He was also being exceptional and apart, handsome, high-spirited and witty, without responsibilities or duties, lifted to a pinnacle above common human fate. Chatham was his godfather, and there were attempts to make him a statesman. But the sensitive creature preferred the luxury of dreams. What had the world’s coarse traffic to offer him? He buried himself in books, and cultivated a scornful solitude, in which he never became morbid, for he never knew ennui; his mind was too tough and too agile for that. Once, when detained at Lausanne, he bought Gibbon’s library to have something to read, and all was well. When he tired of books and pictures he could write his “Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters,” a learned squib that still amuses, was composed in his 17th year. Thus he became doubly isolated, first by his position, and then by the intoxication of his imagination, which transmuted his environment as effectually as opium. The halls and corridors of Fonthill dissolve into endless Oriental perspectives, the butler becomes a chief enmich and the maids the ladies of the harem. In an early letter we see him, after a lonely stroll on a December afternoon, sitting under an oak and watching the rook's scatter in the sky. Then he walks home to tea.

The Bats fly frequently before me and many an Owl—according to the mythology of Birds, hastened to perform incantations. I then ascended to the steps which lead to a vast hall paved with Marble and seating myself, like the Orientals, on Cushions of Brocade placed by a blazing fire was served with Tea and a species of white bread which has crossed the Atlantic. Meanwhile my thoughts were wandering in the interior of Africa and dwelt for hours on those Countries I love. One instant I imagined myself viewing the marble palaces of Oriental princes seated in the green woody margin of lakes, studded in sands and wildernesses; the next transported me to the rocks of Carena where Atlantes strove vainly to preserve Ruggiero from the Perils of War. Some minutes after, I found myself standing before a thick wood listening to impetuous waterfalls and screened from the Sun by its foliage. I was wondering at the Scene when a tall comedy Negro wound along the slopes of the Hills and without moving his lips made me comprehend I was in Africa, on the brink of the Nile beneath the mountains of Amara.

Such was the effect on this boy of the Dorsetshire downs and the fireside hour. But he is not really carried away. The cool half of his mind watches the dreams and enjoys them with a hard and brutal egoism. Thanks to this coolness, he could create; what gives "Vathek" its force and flavour is not merely pleasure in dallying with the vertigo of sin, but the knowledge that he is never for a moment in danger. His imagination, had he been born a generation later, might have been nourished by ideas. But it never got beyond the sensuous, and, when the fumes of sense cleared, hardened into a fastidious intolerance of the commonplace, finally shading off into the complete gentleman's conviction of his own superiority. Artistically sterile, he spends the rest of his long life in laborious trifling.

After perambulating the Continent, the image of British morgue, for eight years, he came home in 1794, pulled down the old house and built a gmcrack abbey (with a great tower, which fell down) to hold his art treasures. The abbey was built "partly in ruins," and its contents were in keeping: Hazlitt, who went to the sale in 1822, calls it "a cathedral turned into a toyshop." Beckford, who hated Horace Walpole, said that Strawberry Hill was "a species of Gothic mouse-trap, a reflection of Walpole's littlenesses." His own taste as a collector, if more virile and dash than Walpole's, was evidently bad, though it should be remembered that he had reserved his best things and taken them to Bath. The cause of the crash was partly a lawsuit which deprived him of two estates said to have been worth £30,000 a year, and partly the depreciation of his property in Jamaica.

At Bath, established modestly in Lansdown Crescent, he was still able to buy land on Lansdown Hill and to indulge his taste for towers. "He was scarcely known to be in Bath," says the inevitable diarist, "before a beautiful tower, planned in the purest taste, suddenly appeared on the summit of the highest eminence in the vicinity." In this tower, as the nineteenth century wore on, the spirit "all air and fire," which had created "Vathek," pestered out in the pursuit of hobbies. He became a furious bibliomaniac, following the London sales and driving his bargains with the hardness of senile passion. Heraldic and genealogical research was another craze. His "Liber Veritatis," in which "I pull the peacock sadly about," is in the archives of Hamilton Palace. The Alderman's son had a weakness for rank. According to the Gentleman's Magazine,

By a patent dated August 11, 1791, Mr. Beckford's arms were placed within a bordure or, charged with a treasure fryal gates, as a memorial of his lineal descent from the royal blood of Scotland; and by a second grant dated March 20, 1810, the single was changed into a double treasure, in consideration of the extraordinary accumulation of descents from royal and illustrious families concentrated in his person.

These pursuits kept him happy to the end. There has been much snobbish fuss about his eccentricity and the intrepidity of his dandyism, but no one has tried to explain, for no one has noticed, the tragedy of his decay. This little lonely old-fashioned gentleman, correct, dignified, well-preserved, straight as a dart, riding about the outskirts of Bath with a g Ramsey at a respectful distance, or thumbing his catalogues and arranging his stained-glass windows so that a rosy light should fall on his marble cupids—how could an original genius come to this? We suggest that the pride of wealth and power first prematurely forced and then did a deadly work upon his soul. No breath of generous inspiration could ever reach him, so that he dried and toughened and froze—for he could not become flabby—until there was nothing to distinguish him from other men of fashion save his loneliness, his oddities and the hypertrophy of his possessive instincts.

Poetry

THE WHISPER

To what enchanted twilight fall,
Where things of sense and things of thought
Are to a scarce material
Oneness refined,
Beckons my softly whispering mind?

Soft, with what whispers too soft whispering
Hath mind envenomed being with a kiss
Whose sullen, unabating sting
Derides the bliss
The mind once whispered—did it whisper this?

Only where thou art not shall thy calm be,
Deeper than thy most deep discovery,
Thou finite lover of infinity,
Follow thou me.

I am thy not-self perfect shaped by stress
Of the defect of thy own imperfection;
Only with me shalt thou, the comfortless,
Ease thy distress.

Where at the last thy baffled hungry eyes,
Turning downcast from their high enterprise,
Droop at the veil of heart-inwoven lies.
There I arise;

And the dumb longing in thy soul entwined
That gads thee from the ways of all thy kind,
Pain-marred, self-exiled, mutilate, purblind
Among the blind,

Is love of me who love despairingly.
Thy fellow-exile from felicity,
And waste unsought my cold virginity
That is unloosed to be...
The triumph and the consummation
Of the unstained desire that feeds upon Love’s treachery to love, wherein alone
I to thyself am known.

Yet love’s defection that alone may see
The hemlock eyes of love’s true loyalty,
Being fevered by his canker frailty,
Hath but a dream of me.

Soft with these whispers too soft whispering
Mind hath envenomed with his kiss,
And with the poisoned pleasure of his sting Hath numbed what in me is
All but the ear to hear the whisper whisper this,

HENRY KING.

CONTORTIONIST

This strange man has no bones, he bends
All ways, his head and heels like friends
Affectionately meet and kiss, Around that supple frame of his
His limbs, fantastically spangled,
Are all deliciously entangled.

Contortionist insensibly,
Out of the straining body we see,
Becomes a system of design,
Of interpenetrant tone and line.
Coloured planes that mingle and shift
Across that heaving torso drift.

I saw the bellicose Cubist
Agaze at this contortionist,
I said: “Observe the delicate tones
That mark the play of muscles and bones.
Those gracious curves in all his tangles
Should put one out of love with angles.

He has no pyramidal eyes,
Nor iron girders for his thighs,
Nor thorax like a mangled box,
Nor shoulders built of solid blocks.
Oh, do not to a Cubist plan
Reduce this shapely little man!

God bless the good contortionist,
And help him through each wriggle and twist!
And do not let him ossify,
But keep him agile as a fly!
And give him a kind, obedient wife
To make him happy all his life!”

J. J. ADAMS.

ESTHER MILBURN

Once realized, what else was left to do
But part and go our separate ways anew?
I’ve not set eyes upon him since that night.
Why did we marry? Why did that paper light
I held the match to? Yes, it’s gone black out,
Leaving the sticks unkindled, and no doubt
The fire must be relaid, before ’twill burn.
But when love fails, there is no second turn.
If once the paper doesn’t fire the wood,
Or the blazing wood, the coal, there’s little good
In striking matches to eternity:
They only shunt and flicker mockingly,
Scorching the fingers, to illuminate
Charred litter in the cold bars of the grate.

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.
heavily. The Portsmouth mail coach has already lost its way; several ships have foundered, and Margate pier has been totally destroyed. At Hatfield Peverel twenty sheep have been buried, and though one supports itself by gnawing wurzels which it encounters near it, there is a grave reason to fear that the French king's coach has been blocked on the road to Colchester. It is now the 16th of February, 1808.

Poor Mrs. Mitford! Twenty-one years ago she left the breakfast-room, and no news has yet been received of her child. Even Mendacity is a little ashamed of itself, and, picking up "Mary Russell Mitford and her Surroundings," announces that everything will come all right if we possess ourselves in patience. The French king's coach was on its way to Bocking; at Bocking lived Lord and Lady Charles Murray-Aynsley; and Lord Charles was shy. Lord Charles had always been shy. Once, when Mary Mitford was five years old—sixteen years, that is, before the coach were lost and the French king went to Bocking—Mary threw him into an agony of blushing by running up to his chair in mistake for the page. He was not to have left the room. Miss Hill, who, somewhat strangely, finds the society of Lord and Lady Charles pleasant, does not wish to quit it without "introducing an incident in connection with them which took place in the month of February, 1808." But is Miss Mitford concerned in it? To some extent; that is to say, Lady Charles was a cousin of the Mitfords, and Lord Charles was shy. Mendacity is quite ready to deal with the "incident" even on these terms, but we have had enough of trifling. Miss Mitford may not be a great woman; for all we know she was not even a good one; but we have certain responsibilities as a reviewer which we are not going to evade.

A sense of the beauty of nature has never been altogether absent from English literature; yet no one can deny that the difference between Pope and Wordsworth in this respect is very considerable. "Lyrical Ballads" was published in 1798; Miss Mitford's "Our Village" first saw the light in 1824. One being in verse and the other in prose, it is not necessary to labour a comparison which contains, however, elements of justice. Like her great predecessor, Miss Mitford much preferred the country to the town; and thus it may be not be inopportune to dwell for a moment upon the King of Saxony, Mary Anning, and the ichthyosaurus. Let alone the fact that Mary Anning and Mary Mitford had a Christian name in common, they are further connected by what can scarcely be called a fact, but may without hazard be called a probability. Mary Mitford was looking for fossils at Lyme Regis only fifteen years before Mary Anning found one. The King of Saxony visited Lyme in 1844, and, seeing the head of an ichthyosaurus in Mary Anning's window, asked her to drive to Pinny, and explore the rocks. While they were looking for fossils, an old woman seated herself in the king's coach—was she Mary Mitford? Truth compels us to say that she was not; but there is no doubt that Mary Mitford often expressed a wish that she had known Mary Anning, and it is singularly unfortunate to have to state that she never did. In the year 1844 Mary Mitford was fifty-seven years of age, and so far what we know of her is curiously negative; she had not known Mary Anning, she had not found an ichthyosaurus, she had not been out in the snowstorm, and she had not seen the King of France.

But then, in justice to Miss Hill and her fellow-biographers, what do we know of people? Even in the case of our friends the deposit of certainty is still span over by a myriad changing shades; what they are depends upon who we are; then there are marriage, separation, the taking of office, and the birth of children; in short, when we come to say what anyone is like we often find ourselves in Miss Hill's predicament without her excuse and merely reply that an anonymous old woman once sat in the King of Saxony's coach. If this is so with the living, what can we know about the dead? Surely we can only invent them, and the best biographers are those who have most inventive power, along with an affinity of temperament which easily transmits shocks of love and hatred. Therefore poor Miss Mitford—but how "poor!" Miss Mitford if we know nothing about her? The truth is, however vain, trifling, or inspired a biography may be, so long as it makes mention of man or woman, it never fails to stir vibrations of sympathy—account for it how one can. A phrase in a letter, a glance from a portrait, an old name on a tomb, and the mischief is done—we love or we hate. Admitting that the adjective is probably wrong, we go on: Poor Miss Mitford was poor from a variety of reasons. In the first place she was consumed by a passion for her father. Squat, broad, beetle-browed herself, she could never see him in his blue coat and buff waistcoat without feeling that she scarcely deserved to be his daughter. Mrs. Mitford was entirely of the same way of thinking, only, as she was wont to say when the two women took counsel together, her case was worse than Mary's." Lord Bocking found $3,000 which the Rev. William Harness would not allow her to touch, and besides, Mary was so clever with her pen. "If only we had a pony carriage," she sighed, for they were now in a small cottage on the Reading Road, and all the china was sold or broken, "I could take him for a drive and it might distract his mind"—from dwelling upon schemes for lighting houses, she meant. Mary looked out of the window. As it happened, two dogs were fighting, a beggar-woman was sauterning down the road, and a tinker's cart stood in front of the wheelwright's shop. Seizing her pen, she dashed off a description of the scene, and once more won the prize. "Our Village" went into three editions in a hurry. "Miss Mitford's stories have been put out in the pony cart three or four times already, to my great delight," she wrote. A pony cart seems a handsome return for looking out of the window, and yet if we consider what it must be like to sit at the same window, year in, year out, hoping that a dog may trip up an old woman, or that the cobbler's little girl may break the jug in which she is carrying his beer in order that the Americans may rejoice in the simplicity of rural England, one feels that to smash the window, strangle the doctor, and hangstring all the ponies in Berkshire would, as they say in novels, be the work of a moment. Even Miss Mitford has been known to curse the leveret. Her own taste was for tragic. She made the death of Mr. Murry—Rienzi, the friend of Petrarch; about Charles I., and Inez de Castro; but how write plays when your father is "addicted to games of chance"? Back to the sitting-room went poor Miss Mitford. "Not for all the gold of Peru would I exchange him for another!" she exclaimed, however. For people had a way of pitying her; and that she could not stand.

So one word is by no means enough for Miss Mitford. There are thousands craving to be used of her. Again, consider all the scenes of which she is the centre. Which are we to choose? Her father lay decaying on the sofa. He would not let her leave the room. He slept at last. Putting her fingers to her lips, andundoing the latch without disturbing him, she stepped out on to the common. Her heart rose within her. So safe, so good, so holy it all seemed to her, and the air so sweet. There was a cuckoo and the church bell ringing for service. She thanked God for England. Then old Dr. Mitford died. How kind people were—coming to the funeral from miles away! Then she made the acquaintance of Mr. James Payn. Then Keren-Happuch found a glowworm in her bedroom. She was extremely fond of glowworms. "K. said that 'now I could not go to them they came to me.'" they come in with the wild woodbine? She liked writing all this to a letter to a literary young man, and he liked to hear her talk of "Keats, Wordsworth and myself" all in the same breath. It was a little awkward when she got upon her father, as she was apt to do, and kindling and querying said what a patriot, what a martyr he had been when all the world knew—or did the world know? One never can tell. Anyhow, it was easy to lead her back to her books. Her walls were packed with them. They were strewn on the floor. She would denounce a bad book "as though it were a thing of life." All sorts of books, all sorts of men she would discuss with vehemence, yet with sobriety. "But then I suppose I am the least romantic person that ever wrote plays. Do write good English, Mr. Payn, and for Heaven's sake, don't go and marry for love!" That was one of the queer things about her, and her cottage was such a commonplace villa, too, standing right on the high road without a creeper to its face. Then, again, though she was undoubtedly dressed, no one could tell what she was dressed in, or know from looking at her as she lay on two chairs which was tiny Miss Mitford and which was rug quilt, skirt, or dressing-gown. There was no mistaking her face, however—immensely broad, with a "deep globular brow" and two such eyes as Charles Kingsley had never seen in an Englishwoman's head—glowing and glittering and yet "perfectly honest the while." But now we must stop making up stories about Miss Mitford.

HOW OR WHY?

PSYCHOLOGY AND FOLK-LORE. By R. R. Marett. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

TWO schools of anthropology are at daggers drawn in England. One, the ethnological, believes in the transmission of culture of all sorts from one people to another, and insists on the need for the analysis of culture before the data are utilized in speculations concerning origins. The other, known as "evolutionary" or psychological, is totally opposed to the idea of culture transmission or ignores it importance; if its less extreme adherents, of whom Dr. Marett is one, recognize the historical method, they make it the handmaid, not the equal, of their own psychological mode of attacking the problems.

The validity of a method is best tested by its results. What has been attained by the study of Australian data from the purely evolutionary standpoint? Sir James Frazer based his theory of totemism on the twin assumptions of the primity of the Arunta and the homogeneity of totemism wherever it has been described. Yet, even before he wrote, Arunta primity had been disproved by the discovery that their language is not Australian; the analysis of culture would have shown him that his theory was based on the sand. To-day the second of his assumptions has also gone by the board; the supposed unity of totemism is the creation of the European observer. As a result, the psychological school may seek grounds for revising its axiom that "there are certain pervasive elements of culture susceptible to separate treatment." To take the rubbish heap of travellers' tales for supposed parallels, regardless of the writers' real knowledge or ignorance of the peoples, regardless also of cultural affinities, is to invite disaster. It is not surprising that, as Dr. Rivers said a few years ago, the main problems of the history of human society are little, if at all, nearer solution, while some points which were regarded as settled are to-day as uncertain as ever. Research is bound to be harder when the workers do not agree as to fundamental principles.

There are other weaknesses inherent in the psychological method besides those mentioned above; it makes the wholly unproven assumption that modern man can from his own inner consciousness evolve ideas that will throw light on the group psychology of the early stages of human evolution. Yet there is little in common between primitive man and the twentieth-century student of human culture. It is, perhaps, not an accident that opposition to the ethnological school is most marked among those whose experience of the peoples whom we unjustly term savages is small or non-existent. The field worker realizes more deeply the complexity of culture, the uncertainty of the theories poured out without stint by the armchair anthropologist, and the unreliability of many of the data on which the comparative method relies. Take up any work on comparative religion. The word of the casual traveller is as authoritative as that of the man who has lived forty years among a people; knowledge of the language of a tribe lends little or no authority to the work of a writer; theories in comparative religion are based on the documents of forty years ago. Despite the flood of anthropological literature, nowhere is there any attempt at a complete survey of the facts of a given area.

As a psychological anthropologist Dr. Marett lays little stress on changes due to outside influence; regarding transformation as the result of internal forces, he proposes to substitute auto-suggestive methods for the analysis of culture. He holds that the student can better understand our own folk-lore if he dances round the maypole. If his object is to understand and describe the mental state of the less cultured portions of his own race, we may, perhaps, look for progress in this direction, though it is clear that the simplistic observation of the psychologist on his own emotions is hardly the same as that of the tiller of the soil. Much less, then, is it that of the man of two thousand years ago from whom the rites have come down to us. Kiss-in-the-ring may be a relic of early European marriage customs; but it is not clear that either Dr. Marett or his pupils can elucidate these customs by observing their emotions when they take part in the game. If this is true of data belonging to our own age and culture, how much more is it true of the inheritance of an alien people? But if light is to be thrown on origins by such a method, where are we to stop? Ought Dr. Rivers, who studies marriage and the duties of kinship, to lead home a dusky bride in every isle of Oceania?

As a concession, perhaps, to group psychology, Dr. Marett takes as his starting-point the study of communal lore, dances, songs, drama; but though he begins by suggesting that we thus study the phenomena of culture contact from the inside, he ultimately admits that behaviourism is the correct method. We must observe the peasant's behaviour and "infer as best we can how allowance is to be made for the necessary differences in the accompanying frame of mind." If this caution is necessary in dealing with our own peasants, who have lost their original home, and whose arts are in the later stages of transformation, how much more is it needed when we investigate the mental state of those whose language and mode of thought is a sealed book? Dr. Marett hardly does himself justice when he tells us that the pigmies have a well-marked distinction between the natural and the supernatural. Neglectful of his own warning that a common measure of inward experience is often lacking, he puts down this conclusion as a result of an hour's conversation through an interpreter.

Needless to say, Dr. Marett's presentation of his case in the eleven essays here reprinted is vivid and arresting; at times dryly logical, at others vividly unbalanced. In justice to Dr. Rivers he should have omitted or qualified the statement (p. 15) that the latter wishes to rule out the psychological method.

CHAUCER AND SPENSER

A Commentary on the Poetry of Chaucer and Spenser. By Adolphus Alfred Jack, Chalmers Professor of English Literature in the University of Aberdeen. (Glasgow, MacLehose & Jackson. 8s. 6d. net.)

ONE has often heard recently, and has sometimes sympathized with, complaints of the sort of réclame now commonly put on the wrappers of books. It is of course irritating to the not completely philosophical mind when it suggests that the publisher thinks that mind incapable of making itself up, and therefore kindly supplies it with a ready-made approval. On the other hand, the practice may be very useful when the advertisement is confined to an explicit statement of what the book is intended to provide. Although perhaps more people read prefaces nowadays than used to be the case, it is not a universal practice; and even a preface-reader may miss the clou. In the present case the wrapper has been utilized for the purpose of presenting an extract from Professor Jack’s own Preface, which is eminently useful and to the point—especially the central sentence of the extract used to do. What is the interest in Schoolmen that poem to the modern reader is practically the sole question with which I have continuously concerned myself.” The words which we have italicized at once pose the book, and free it from any grumble such as “What! more about two poets who have been, for years, decades, and generations past, historied, essayed and lectured about, edited, commented and taught?”

Of course the cross-bench mind will not be disarmed even by this declaration of purpose. What business has the modern reader in respect of his modernity to be specially catered for? Ought not literature to be as much as possible brought sub specie aeternitatis? Is it not, in effect, the chief merit and excellence of literary study that it lifts the mind out of “the cackle of its bourg,” the close atmosphere of its home climate, the trammels and limitations of its special environment? There might be a very great deal to be said for these objections if it were not that they favour, if they do not necessarily involve, the old error of asking a writer to do something else than that which he has explicitly announced himself as meaning to do. No doubt Professor Jack could have treated Chaucer and Spenser perfectly well from the point of view indicated in the objections themselves. But he has chosen to do something else, and is entitled to avail himself of the unanswerable “Quaerat alius diversorum” if people do not like what he has provided.

There is moreover, beyond doubt, something both chivalrous and charitable in the attempt to be modern with the modernist, if by any means you may save him for the enjoyment of something more than mere modernity. As Professor Jack very truly observes, readers to-day do not shy at the mere language of Chaucer or of Spenser as much as they used to do. "Actual teaching in Schoolmen have had something to do with this, but critics and commentators from Tyndall and Wattons onwards may claim some of the credit. On the other hand, the sense of something strange and uncomfortable—as he or she would very likely call it, "something weird"—in atmosphere, thought, manners, has probably grown. Once upon a time a shopgirl in Lamb’s Conduit Street heard somebody mention the country. "The country!" she said. "I was there once, and I don’t like it. There are no" (and her not uncomely visage took on hues of amazed horror) "gaslights in the roads!" It was just before electricity, or no doubt she would have postulated that. Undoubtedly there are, thanks to chivalry in education and other things, more readers who are horrified or bored at not finding gaslights in the roads of the "Canterbury Tales" and "The Faerie Queene" than there used to be—among those who read these poems at all.

It is for their benefit that Professor Jack has undertaken this book, though we are by no means to be understood as maintaining that he has actually done Chaucer and Spenser made easy,” or “reduced to words of three letters.” On the contrary, there is to be found here—more specially present perhaps in the Spenser part, but by no means absent in the other—a view of the poetical characters of the subjects which is quite worth the attention of readers who would most indignantly disclaim the charge of modernist purliness. Only the anxiety to provide substitutes for gaslamps—or at least to explain how there is moonlight, even in the country, for repayment, and how when there is no moon you can still indoors and employ or amuse yourself pleasantly there—is the main object. And it is one which, on the great principle of Spathian nactus est, nobody can belittle.

One advantage of it is that Professor Jack, while manifesting all due acquaintance with the infinite studies in the infinitely little—biographical, philological, etc.—which have been bestowed on these two great poets, has acquired and availed himself of the right to summarize results pretty briefly. On disputed points, such, for instance, as the endless worry about the parts of the English “Rose,” he nearly, if not quite, always takes the common-sense view. There may be perhaps a little over-anxiety, with a consequent arbitrariness, in separating Chaucer’s "young" and his older work. One fancies that what with the poet’s evident habit of leaving some things unfinished and retouching others, and the not improbable habit of imitators in meddling with his work, sharp assignments of date are pretty perilous. But as far as youth is supposed to imply imitativeness on his own part, and maturity originality, there is no need to quarrel. The presentation of Chaucer’s essential geniality is capital: though the modern Rimmon is perhaps a little bowed to in acknowledgments that he was not a wholly serious person. In the Spenser part—which, even without its lion’s share of the Appendix, is much the larger—it is particularly satisfactory to notice how, while Professor Jack excepts against his author on some points where one would unflinchingly support the poet, the marvellous charm of that squalloned magician has practically reconciled him. Only the mildly scolding Yeats’s censure of Spenser as “too wide,” he accepts most of it because “poets are best judged by poets.” This is perhaps a case of treacherous generalities. Certainly Mr. Yeats is a poet; but is not Spenser the author of “The State of Ireland”?

The use of the word "continuously" in the sentence which we quoted above is not careless. No very small part of the book, both in main text and in appendix, contains matter directly intended for others besides those who believe that, as in a sort of chronological handicap, the world—at least the world worth attending to—started at a later date. Chaucer and Spenser receive rather minute attention; there is an interesting chapter on the contrast of Spenser’s "Fairies" with the more usual subjects of that precious key— or queen—dom; and appendices deal with Spenser’s similes, his peculiar "pictures of soft peace" and his and other "Archaic language." Also, one may note some obiter dicta collecting. It may not be quite true that "we are all Palammonians" (the present writer has from his earliest youth been an Arcritic stalwart), but the statement is interesting. It is a comfort to find somebody saying of Mr. Swinburne that "in substance he was never an imitator," for Dick Minim to-day says just the contrary. There are very sound remarks on Dryden: and we may finish with an excellently appreciative distinction on William Morris: "The Defence of Guenevere" gives us something which, though it cannot be mistaken for medieval writing, opens a window on the romance of the Middle Age.”

BOEHME

The Confessions of Jacob Boehme. Compiled by W. Scott Palmer. With an Introduction by Evelyn Underhill. (Methuen.
5s. net.)

There is less purely autobiographical matter in this little volume than its title would suggest. Lovers of gossipy Half-Hours with Great Men will look in vain for the small personal details of Boehme’s life. But those who wish to know about the psychology of the mystic—and, when all is said, the most interesting thing about any system of philosophy is the light it throws on the temperament of its author—will find much that is instructive in these pages.

The belief that lies at the bottom of Boehme’s philosophy, as of the systems of all the great religious teachers, is that the universe is interested in good and evil. It is a belief that is in origin purely temperamental. Either, like Boehme, you do, or you do not “find in all things evil and good,
love and anger; in the inanimate creatures, in wood, stones, earth and the elements, as also in men and beasts.”
The belief in a good and evil universe is simply a feeling, as a sensation. One man may be born with a peculiarly good eye for colours and another with none; the colour-blind man will never know the sensations of the other and no persuasion can make him believe in their intensity, no description can cause him to share them.
From the original postulate that the universe is preoccupied with good and evil, Boehme advances to a position in which he can “declare that the eternal Being, and also this world, is like a head driven to the point of nothing but that which is like itself; as you find man to be, so is eternity.” On the foundation of his original temperamental conviction Boehme built up the elaborate superstructure of his philosophical system. But in this, as in all other systems of mystical philosophy, the value consists not in the doctrines enunciated, but in the emotions which underlie them and of which the doctrines are the intellectual expression. Emotions can only be immediately expressed by exclamation—the “Oo-oo” of the crowd looking at fireworks; they appear in literature digested by the intellect, explained. To use the traditional phraseology, mystical philosophy starts in the heart as a feeling and is converted by the intellect into a doctrine. Emotions are the works of the mystics start from the other end, beginning with the intellectual doctrines. As truth these doctrines may not possess the slightest value; but they will be valuable if we can get back through them to the cordial feelings from which they were originally developed.
Mystical philosophy will be worth studying if we can arrive, through it, at the emotional state, so calm, so serene, of the mystic.

Mr. Scott Palmer has selected many of Boehme’s sayings about the road which must be followed in order to reach this state of blessedness. It is not an altogether pleasant road; for before there can be rebirth there must be death.
The process seems to be one of getting into touch with the immense stores of life which have their dwellings in the subconscious mind. The discovery of that life is the source of the mystic’s strength and serenity. But to find it a man must put his individual conscious self out of action, must wait through what may be a long period of ennui and spiritual death until the new, more copious life begins to flow into his mind. The psychology of mystical rebirth has, we believe, much in common with the psychology of poetic inspiration. The subject deserves investigation.

“LEDA”

In the passage which we find among the most interesting in a book which is to our immediate sense a document rather than an achievement, Mr. Huxley writes thus of “Beauty”:

It is not a far-fetched, dear-bought gem; no pandemon will be smelt only when the crowd becomes too stinkingly insistent; it is not a rare birth of oboes or violins, not visible only from ten to six by divine permission at a nominal charge, not a thing solidly apart, but an ethic, a way of belief and of practice, of faith and works, mediavel in its implication with the very threads of life.
I desire no Paphian cloister of pink monks. Rather a rosy Brotherhood of Common Life; marrying and giving in marriage; taking and in adulterv; reading, thinking, and when thinking fails, feeling immeasurably more subtly, sometimes perhaps creating.

These are the discordant accents not of a vision, but of a glimpse, most precisely not of a faith, but of a velleity, the new Thelem of a neurotistic Rabelais of 1920.

It is good to be Rabelais; hardly possible not to be neurotistic—to respond to contemporary experience one needs to be, like the best pianos, a little overstrung—but how combine them? To react against preciseness:

Ad vocare gradum superasque vadere ad auram
Hac opus, hic labor est.

In this labour Mr. Huxley is apparently and painfully engaged. Fleeting glimpses of that high empyrean courage him and us; but predominantly we are aware of the dust, the dust and above all the sweat. Not that Mr. Huxley really likes the smell of it, but he is involved in a desperate remedy. This is his “medicinal balm”:
for the present he is absorbed in rubbing his nose in it.

On the question whether a pink monk is likely to become a convincing rosy brother by Mr. Huxley’s method we have no wish to dogmatize; but we do believe that the process is one best kept from the general eye until the novitiate has been triumphantly ended. The Beauty that Mr. Huxley has glimpsed would justify—more, give a value to—the most intimate diary of the journey towards it, when once it has been achieved. What makes us uneasy is a suspicion that Mr. Huxley, who is clever and sensitive and learned and knows this, must believe that he has attained the object of his search and struggle. We feel that he puts his long poem “Leda” before us as the evidence of victory.

We cannot accept it. The elements that Mr. Huxley has desired to combine, the precious esoteric beauty and the ugliness which were to be blended into a new comprehensive beauty in whose light nothing should appear common or unclean, are still as unmixed as oil and vinegar.

The beauty that the poem has— and it has not a little—is the old beauty of elimination; the ugliness that it has—and it has a passage of surpassing ugliness—is the old ugliness of repulsion, naked, unresolved. Mr. Huxley has, we think, deceived himself. His reconciliation of opposites is unreal; and the reason why, being so clever, he has deceived himself is precisely that he is so clever. He has chosen his ground too adroitly, for the myth of Leda and the swan is one of the few that permit ugliness to assume the vesture of beauty.

In other words, it is a conjuring trick played with the incidents of poetry. It has the air of being an advance upon the early Keats; it is in reality a long step backwards from him. It looks for a moment as though it were a kind of classical perfection of modern poetry, whereas it is an evasion of the problem that modern poetry, with all its stupid and intelligent hesitations, is trying to face. Were it another than Mr. Huxley, we should accuse him of playing to the gallery. A man of a little less than complete sincerity may, however, play to the gallery of his own mind.
“Leda” is a retrogression from “Endymion,” from which it outwardly derives, because the beauty at which it aims is purely external. Nothing could be more “richly apart”; it is emphatically not “an ethic, a way of belief and of practice,” as was the beauty which Keats sought with groping confusion and flashes of insight in “Endymion.” Like the classicism of M. Pierre Loty’s, of whom it continually reminds us, it is without significance. A classicism without spiritual significance, as Mr. Huxley himself in the passage we have quoted clearly sees, comes near perversity. On the other hand, “Leda” is an evasion of the problem which the most authentic modern poetry is endeavouring to solve, which is to give beauty a fuller content by exploring unfamiliar paths of sensation and perception. At present the issue is obscured by the importunities of the rank and file whose only notion of poetry is that they themselves want to be advanced, but the most original spirits of our time leave the discerning in no doubt that their aim is a new acceptance, a new comprehension and, paradoxical though it may sound, a new asceticism. “Leda” seems to us, both in form and content, a self-indulgence rather than a self-discipline.

If Mr. Huxley wishes to be judged, he should elect to be judged, not by “Leda,” nor by any of the shorter poems in this book, but by “Soles Occidere et Redire Posunt,” which we hope and believe was written after “Leda.” It is fragmentary, unrealized, and chiefly it lacks an essential austerity in the use of rhythm and language; but it is definitely in the main stream of modern poetry. In it Mr. Huxley has had no more than glimpses of what he wishes to express; the emotional music has been only half-heard. But whereas “Leda” is a backsliding, “Soles” is an advance. As for two-thirds of the shorter pieces, we think he would have been well advised never to print them. They might have their place in an _appendix_ in the present condition of the author’s achievement they will not only make the ignorant blaspheme, but cause even the well-intentioned to stumble.

MR. FOSTER’S LIVY

The flood of classical translations, good and bad, continues; and among the good we are delighted to find Mr. Foster’s _Livy_. For the whole of the first decade we now possess the text of Messrs. Walters and Conway, a work of distinguished excellence, to which, for the first two books, Mr. Foster’s translation is a valuable complement. His Introduction is intelligent and strictly relevant, and his version reaches and maintains a quite remarkably high level both of accuracy and of interest. For accuracy we have tested it by comparison with the original. As for the other qualities which make of it a book, not simply a good crib, we testify that we have read the English version not twice but three times through, and intend to read it again when Mr. Foster’s second volume appears.

Livy, we were told at school, had no notion of a critical method, and was unfortunately prone to sacrifice the strictness of historical inquiry to the picturesqueness of his narrative. At school we were too much entangled in the difficulty of the Latin to give full credit to this story. Indeed, as our instructors drew attention to the author’s Gracisms, and warned us to remember in our cases that Livy was not Ciceroian, some of us thought the story of his picturesqueness was a pretty fable. We did not mind at all about his wicked tendency to be unscientific. We were only sceptical about the theory that the aim of his inaccuracy was to make the story vivid. Read Mr. Foster’s version and you will see how wrong we were. The story is delightful, exciting, never dull, and, in spite of all mythsologies, it tells the truth. And if Mr. Foster sensations, any one of half-a-dozen annalists— or, we may add, of modern source-hunters—would have served to tell us what the Romans did. It required the genius of Livy to make us realize what the Romans were. If we hated Livy, as many of us did at school, it was not Livy’s fault. Read Mr. Foster’s version aloud to a class of little boys or girls, then help them to read Livy’s text for themselves. You will not find them grumbling at his dullness, nor much agitated, we fear, about his scientific method.

Consider, for example, his account of the arrival of the Tarquins family in Rome. Lucumo, you remember, was a rich and an ambitious person, not appreciated at Tarquinii, where his wealth could not compensate for alien origin. But... the self-confidence implanted in his bosom by his wealth was heightened by his marriage with Tanaquil, who was a woman of the most excited birth, and not of a character likely to endure a humber rank in her new environment than she had enjoyed in the condition to which she had been born.

Tanaquil formed the project of emigrating from Tarquinii, and Rome appeared to her most suitable for the adventure. Amongst a new people, where all rank was of sudden growth and founded on worth, there would be room for a brave and strenuous man. She had no trouble in persuading a man who was eager for distinction...

And so they packed their possessions, and removed to Rome. When they reached the Janiculum, as they were sitting in their covered carriage, an eagle freshly descended on them, plucked off Lucumo’s cap, rose in the air, then stooped again, and deftly replaced the cap upon his head.

This augury was joyfully accepted, it is said, by Tanaquil, who was a woman skilled in celestial prodigies, as was the case with most Etrusci. Embracing her husband, she bade him expect transcendent greatness; such was the meaning of that bird appearing from that quarter of the sky, and bringing tidings from that god... Such were their hopes and their reflections as they entered the city. Having obtained a house, they gave out the name of Lucius Tarquinii Priscus.

“Domicilioque ibi comparato L. Tarquinium Priscum edidere nomen.” Such traditions, Livy tells us, “as are rather adorned with poetic legends than based upon trusty historical proof,” he purposes neither to affirm nor to refute. He does not much care whether the Horatii were Romans, the Curtii Albans, or vice versa. He credits heads among his authorities. But he knows what are the hopes and the reflections with which Tanaquil and Tarquins transfer themselves from the provinces to found a family in Rome. “Quae vita, qui mores fuerint...” these are the questions to which he would have his readers give their minds. “What chiefly makes the study of history wholesome and profitable is this—huc illud est praeclare in cognitione rerum salubre ac frugiferum”—that you behold the lessons of every kind of experience set forth as on a conspicuous monument.” This, his first principle, Livy never forgets. And that is why his history superseded every other Roman history; why a Spanish reader travelled all the way from Spain to Italy to see him; why the Middle Ages drew such knowledge as they had of ancient Rome from a poor summary of Livy’s work; why Beccadelli sold his country house in order to obtain the money for the purchase of the original; and why even in these scientific days it is worth while for Mr. Foster to complete his task.

AN EPIC OF SOUTH AFRICA

THE SOUTH AFRICAN FORCES IN FRANCE. By Lieut.-Col. John Buchan. (Nelson. 15s. net.)

It is difficult to read the record of the units which came to the war from overseas without gathering the impression that these men did a disproportionate amount of that fighting which wrested victory from the Germans. This is not the case, and no one realizes it better than the authors of these tributes. But there were in the war numerous critical moments in which some unit or other left its mark on history, and the South African contingent can remember with pride some four or five such incidents. It was but a brigade in strength, though much stronger than the normal British brigade; and the men were drawn from all parts of the Union, from various professions and races. Some 15 per cent. of the original force was Dutch; but before the end it had increased to 30 per cent. By that time its losses in France were nearly 15,000, about 300 per cent. of the original force, though there were still some living of those who had fought their way through from their first brush with the Senussi.

General Lukin, who at first commanded them, had been with Botha in the campaign of German South-West Africa, and his brigade was first engaged, in January, 1916, on the western frontier of Egypt. At Baladiz and Agaga they first showed of what they were made; but it was on the Somme they first won fame. Delville Wood is a name that will ever be remembered by the British Army. This terrible wood was seized by the South Africans, and held against the fierce assaults of three German divisions for four days. Over 3,000 strong the brigade had been when it attacked; it could muster no more than 750 when it was relieved. The troops fought also at the Butte de Warlcourt, another of the bloodiest encounters in the war, and in the following year at the battle of Arras. They advanced through the wet mist of September 20, north of the Ypres-Roulers railway, in one of the most successful engagements of the third battle of Ypres. By this time the men had become skilful tacticians, and could give full play to their courage and tenacity. It was their success, very largely, that kindled the hopes of people who had been hitherto sated with the slaughter of this ill-conceived battle.

At the beginning of 1918 the 3rd (Transvaal) battalion had to be absorbed into the other battalions, owing to its losses; and it was the reconstituted brigade that stood at Gauche Wood on March 21. Of its standpoint on that day Col. Buchan writes well. With the exception of the wood itself, the brigade maintained its line intact, despite persistent and almost overwhelming assaults. But the crowning achievement of the force was its steadfast resistance at Marrières Wood. The brigade was now some 500 strong when it stood, on March 24, behind the northern part of the Wood, and it was annihilated. It was reduced to 100 strong, and without ammunition, when it was compelled to surrender; but for a day it held up the Germans, from whom its valiant charge forth the highest admiration. A new brigade was organized, and fought at Messines and on the Lys; and the troops on November 11 were at Grandriez, the easternmost point gained by the British armies in France.

Col. Buchan has produced a very readable account of the achievements of the brigade, and the background into which they are worked is admirably suggested. We have no faults to find with his perspective; but we wonder if it was necessary to be wholly sparing of criticism of the conduct of the war which led to the South Africans being faced by such conditions as those of Delville Wood. Apart from this the Union Government is happy in the choice of its panegyrist.

THE TIGER OF THE WEST

CORRESPONDENCE OF JEAN-BAPTISTE CARRIER. Collected, translated and annotated by E. H. Carrier. (Lane. 15s. net.)

The reconsideration of the French Terrorists has proceeded apace during the last twenty years or so, and if we get more books like M. Madelin’s “Fouché,” and Mr. Bellis’s “Danton” and “Robespierre,” so much the better. Hippolyte Carnot and David d’Angers undertook their apology for Barrère too soon, so Macaulay, to the delight of generations of schoolboys, had an easy task in gibbetting the “Jacobin carrière” they attempted to ensnare. But we have supped so full of Russian horrors that men who were incredible to the comfortable Victorian age have put on humanity of a sort again; and an enlarged view of history persuades us that if the Terrorists were the creators of the Revolution, they were also its slaves. None of them, with the possible exception of Collot d’Herbois, has left a more sinister reputation than Carrier, “the Tiger of the West.”

Candidly reviewed, Carrier remains a typical and repellent figure. He belonged to the attorneys, as Carlyle calls them, who played such a prominent part in the Revolution; he voted with the Mountain for the execution of Louis Capet and other root-and-branch measures, and became one of the formidable “deputies in mission.” First at Rennes, then at Nantes, he purified clerical and particularist, rather than monarchial, Brittany on behalf of the Republic, One and Indivisible. The prospect would have cowed most men, and his colleague Pocholle soon retired to his seat on the Mountain, to “gather from that soil all the new Time lacked.” The British fleet threatened descents on the coast; the émigrés swarmed in the Channel Islands; that redoubtable De Wet, Charette and his “brigands” were perpetually swooping on the raw, bootless and starving troops of the Republic; the population, led by the women and the priests, were at best sullenly hostile. Troubled by no doubts, and sustained, despite chronic ill-health, by an exalted mind, Carrier set himself to stamp out the counter-revolution. It is clear that he had some fine qualities, unselfishness among them. Instead of spying on his generals, like most deputies in mission, he loyally backed them up, and he could tell a good soldier like Kéler or Marchand when he saw one.

Time for Marat Carrier, who was twenty again, which performed the domiciliary visits, noyades and other crimes at Nantes, though he used it, was not his creation, but a legacy from his predecessor, Gillet.

That was a strange mental process that converted a quiet teacher like Fouché or a “doux et méme assez charitable” lawyer like Carrier into ruthless oppressors in the name of humanity. For of their ruthlessness there can be no doubt, even if we admit that later investigation has considerably reduced the victims of Carrier’s noyades, and that it was the insurgents who began the practice of butchering prisoners. “Priests have found their grave in the Loire: fifty-three others are to undergo the same fate,” he wrote exultingly; and when “the guillotine no longer sufficed,” he had Charette’s followers shot by hundreds. Deputies in mission, it must be remembered, had to colour their despatches to please the Committee of Public Safety, itself driven on by the occult forces of the Sections. Carrier’s are stuffed with revolutionary phrases accordingly, and, like Fouché at Moulins, he gloated over a carmagnole at Nantes, at which little children assisted in devote to the flames Madonnas and other “last remains of tyranny.” He also, as was the mode, indulged in tags from the classics. Nor was a classical allusion wanting to his old schoolfellow Milhaud, when the day of reckoning came. He voted for Carrier’s execution because in the eyes of the universe the convention was a family of the brothers of Brutus.
TWO NOVELS

Madeline of the Desert. By Arthur Weigall. (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.)
The Lonely House. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d. net.)

Of these two novels the first only is by an inexperienced hand. In the way in which it is written—in its composition—the author has been at no great pains to discover a path that is less trodden than the familiar, popular route. We glance at the opening sentence and read: "The blazing orb of the Egyptian sun had passed behind the rugged hills of the Western Desert when Father Gregory, tall and gaunt..." And then there follows a description of the retreat which he has made for himself and other souls in need of peace and—enter the heroine, "beautiful beyond the ordinary conception of beauty," riding a donkey, smoking a cigarette in a long amber holder, with something of the Russian Hussar, something of the boy and yet something "essentially feminine" in her appearance. Her white slender hands are like those he has seen in the Florentine paintings of the Madonna. She has, of course, come to tell him the story of her life, while the light changes from gold to grey, the smoke rises from the burning fires, and the shepherd returns with their flocks. She is, of course, very naïve, very bitter, very indifferent as to what the end will be. Her mother was an English dancer in a café in Port Said; her father, so they told her, an Irish revolutionary. At sixteen she ran away with a kind man, who, kinder still, died, and left her a fortune. So she came to London, educated herself, played the Magdalene in a pageant, and then drifted—drifted. Now she is sailing down the Nile with an Italian Prince. Why does she tell him all this? Because she has heard him preach in London, because she wants him to look at her as he looked at his congregation then, "with all that blessedness in your face. Oh, man, don't you see that I'm miserable, miserable?"

This for the hardened reader is a by no means promising beginning. And when, a few days later, the holy man receives a letter from her telling him she intends to commit suicide in Port Said, and we are informed at the same time that his nephew has arrived from England and is occupying a room on the same landing as she; when we are forced to trace his growing fascination for the half-gate, half-tragic girl, which culminates in his rescuing her from the moment of despair when she tries to throw herself over the balcony, and to listen to his "God sent me to you just in time," we feel that our worst fears are realized. Here is a new novel—a new unhappened one—about a new carriage hitched on to the same old engine, making the same journey, stopping at the same stations and running into the same sunset. But no, this first novel cannot be dismissed so lightly. Under its appearance of superficiality there is a quite unusual and remarkable understanding of the character of Madeline. However absurd it may seem in this workaday world, it is nevertheless true that there are these little delicate creatures who drift through life until they fall in love as she fell in love with her rescuer. She fell in love and she was born again. The description of her relationship with this ordinary, rather stupid young Englishman is entirely convincing. We wish that Mr. Weigall had been content to write their story without introducing the labour party and their absurd extravagant behaviour. As to Madeline's speechmaking and public appearances—they seem to us irrelevant. In our opinion he should have concentrated on the story of her relationship with Robin and developed the highly amusing character of Daisy Jones. In fact, he should trust himself more and free himself from the idea that a novel is not furnished if it does not contain all the furniture mentioned in all the catalogues.

The case of Mrs. Belloc Lowndes is very different. She belongs to yesterday, and her latest novel is written with such expertise that we feel it were impossible that anything could have been described differently. She has her certain rules; she follows them and she arrives at a certain conclusion. There is something determined and resigned in her manner which reminds us of your carver who has carved chickens for the past—how many—years. There is only one question which suggests itself to the admiring reader. How seriously does she mean us to take these dreadful murders? How shocked are we expected to feel by the spectacle of Lily, that "delightfully pretty, happy-hearted, simple-natured, old-fashioned English girl," on her way to the English church and finding her path barred by the decomposing body of a very nice man whom she had dined with only a short time ago? Whenever incidents of this kind occur, the author has a trick of saying that never in all her life would Lily forget—this or that tragedy of the moment. Wouldn't it be a trifle surprising if she did? The story is simple. Lily is sent to stay with some relations who are not really relations at their villa above Monte Carlo. The household is three in number—Aunt Cosy, the Count, her husband, and an ancient servant, Cristina. From the moment of her arrival we are prepared for the worst, but Lily can face mystery after mystery without suspecting that she is living with arch-criminals. Their habit is to invite wealthy men to dinner, give them delicious food, drug them, and then take them off to some quiet spot, shoot and bury them. In this way their son, a young man of fashion in Roman society, is kept supplied with pocket money. If Lily had not gone to stay at the villa, ten to one they would never have been discovered, unless the trio had become so careless about disposing of the bodies that they had left them like fallen fruit under the trees. Their lack of precaution is one of the most entertaining features of the book. For the reader is entertained and thrilled throughout. His suspicions being awakened from the moment the Countess told Lily she could only have a boiled egg and a piece of bread on her arrival, his eyes are big to see something sinister in everything—even in the bath towel with the hole in it that the heroine finds, later, is used for drying the dishes. Perhaps, after all, this discovery, for the modest young girl, is more dreadful than the finding of that dead body.

LOOKING ON

One after Another. By Stacy Aumonier. (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d. net.)

It would seem nowadays that there is some readjustment going on in the general mind between the importance of feeling and the importance of thought. Was feeling ever simple? We doubt it, and yet we find some of our younger writers looking back upon it as something which it was not impossible to live by in other times, but which, owing to the immense complication of modern existence, has been proved inadequate. They remind us, in fact, disarmingly enough, of a party of men who realize that unless something is done, and done pretty quickly, they will find themselves winter-bound, ice-bound. So this is no time for feeling; they must think a way out. But what is the use, to your artist at any rate, of thought that is not the outcome of feeling? You must feel before you can think; you must think before you can express yourself. It is not enough to feel and write; or to think and write. True expression is the outcome of them both, yet a third thing, and separate. "One after Another" is a novel which lies as it were half way between the two. Now it inclines towards feeling, and now towards thought. And so it divides and subdivides. It is rich and poor, cold and hot, dull and deeply interesting. There are moments of fusion, as, for example, the death of Laura, which give us a glimpse of this book as it might have been, and set us wondering what other author to-day is capable of such sincere and powerful work. But the impression of the whole is of something which has just not succeeded.

There are times when Mr. Aumonier's hero reminds us of that strange character in Tchehov's story, "My Life." He is, in the same way, obedient to Life, and content to be used. Some things move him, and move him profoundly at the time, but the feeling that everything passes is his strongest feeling of all. He begins life as the son of a publican in Camden Town and brother to the famous Laura, a dark, passionate girl who is determined to live, to have a career, to escape from all that she dislikes through music. At the end of his life-story we feel that he is still the son of that simple, living father, that all that has happened to him has been a kind of protracted looking-on at the queer people who came and went. But Laura has, in some strange way, become the dark, passionate music in which she desired to lose herself.

ON WIT

WITH THE WITS. By Paul Elmer More. Sheilburne Essays. Tenth Series (Houghton Mifflin. $2.50)

It is satisfactory to find so influential a writer as Mr. More endorsing in public one of one's own long-cherished opinions, repeating aloud one of one's own privately-whispered prayers. "Send us more malice" is the petition he puts up to the gods in the preface to this pleasant collection of essays: "Send us more malice." Criticism, literature itself, cannot live without malice. For if brevity is the soul of wit, malice is its life. And a criticism without malice is a criticism that lacks savour, an unlearned lump, a ponderous, but ineffective, missile that does no execution among those at whom it is aimed.

We are witnessing at the moment one of those 'returns' on which the historian of literature loves so complacently to dwell. The return on this occasion is taking place in the domain of criticism—a return from appreciation to principles. Our hope is that the return to principles may be accompanied by a return to the malice that made the older criticism by principle effective, a return to the acridity of Pope, to Swift's mangled laughter and gasping of indignant teeth, to the Red Indian methods of the Scotch Reviewers. "Our own day," says Mr. More, "has its peculiar weakness, and would take no harm from the application of special remedies. We suffer from a murky surfeit of self-flattery and sham philanthropy, and a little of the opposite excess might help to clear the air. Some balance of sanity might be struck off from these clashing extremes of flattery and detraction applied to human nature; or, at least, if balance is not to be attained in that way, the result would be mightily amusing. There are several people in the world who need to be vexed. There is almost nobody, indeed, who does not. We need malice in the criticism of life, and malice, too, in the criticism, or, more modestly, the reviewing, of literature. To those who object that the frosty and astringent powers of malicious literary criticism may nip young genius in the bud we would point out that the example of Keats is now entirely out of date. The multiplication of literary journals and the development of advertisement have robbed the critic of that power of life and death which he once possessed. There is in "Illusions Perdues" a chapter, very interesting for the historian, in which Balzac describes the great diminution in the power of criticism brought about, even in his own lifetime, by purely external and mechanical causes. When journals were limited in number and size, when the affiche did not exist and the newspaper advertisement was scarcely born, a critic's abuse or silence was almost enough to destroy a book. But we have altered all that, and to-day it is possible for a book to find a large public without being mentioned, or in spite of being attacked, by the critics. Malice will not suppress genius, and it may conceivably rankle in the hide of the fool. Moreover—and this is our chief reason for desiring it—a little malice would do a great deal to brighten literary journalism. Send us more malice, then—malice to sharpen the pens of our writers, malice to guide the caricaturist's pencil, malice to inspire new Swifts and Popes, new Gillrays and Dammiers and Rouveyres. And now, after having given this extra turn to Mr. More's prefatory prayer-wheel, let us examine the book itself.

One principal criticism of Mr. More's book is that it lacks a central idea. He presents us with a series of critical biographies of individual wits, but he does not explain what were the qualities that gave these different men their common appellation. He would have made a more interesting book if he had started by defining "wit" and showing in what way each individual furnished an example of the general principle. Malice is certainly a very important factor in all wit; but malice without cleverness is of little avail. An analysis of the purely intellectual elements of wit would have been very instructive. We wish that Mr. More could have taken one of the "metaphysical" poets of the seventeenth century, such as, say, Cleveland or Cowley, in whom the purely intellectual qualities of wit are developed to the point of extravagance. We learn to understand normal psychology through the study of the abnormal, and in the same way we shall understand the mechanism of wit by studying those examples of it that come nearest by exaggeration to folly.

But if "With the Wits" lacks a central unifying idea, it is, in compensation, rich in critical thoughts and suggestions scattered by the way, Beaumont and Fletcher, of whose character as wits Mr. More hardly speaks, evoke an interesting discussion on the nature and aim of tragedy. In his final essay on decadent wit—the wit of the eighteen nineties—Mr. More, instead of analysing those qualities which make it still possible to admire Beardsley and to tolerate portions of Oscar Wilde, wanders off into a disquisition—interesting in itself, but too serious to be really relevant to the case in point—on the relationship between morality and art. Mrs. Aphra Behn suggests one of the few generalizations that are pertinent to the central subject of wit. In his essay on this not very exciting authoress, Mr. More calls our attention to a fact of great significance in the history of wit: "Comedy hitherto [up to the time of Steele] had been based on the perception of evil and folly as essentially inherent in human nature; it undertook to strip off the disguise of hypocrisy and to expose the real foibles and vices behind them. Like Wycherley's Manly, the comedian 'spoke ill of men because they deserved it.' The new school of writers would proceed on the very opposite principle. Confidence in the goodness of average human nature is the mainspring of sentimentalism." This confidence in the goodness of human nature is still with us. The point of view of the Restoration wit is alien and strange in our eyes. A modern dramatist who should write a play according to the standards of the Restoration would not be able to hold the stage for a week. One has only to see one of Sacha Guitry's plays to realize the great gulf that separates our point of view from that of the Restoration, our wit from theirs. In one respect—in his attitude towards marriage and the relation of the sexes—Guitry adopts in his comedies precisely the same views as were expressed by Wycherley and Congreve. But here his resemblance to his predecessors end. The almost terrifying hardness and ferocity which underlie the wit of the Restoration are absent in these modern comedies of cuckoldage. In their place we find a fundamentally philanthropic conception, a belief that humanity, in spite of its little faults, even because of them, is wonderfully decent. This change in first principles has brought with it a change in the tone and quality of wit. Instead of Wycherley we have Sir James Barrie. What will be the next development?

A. L. H.

MARGINALIA

The Guitry season at the Aldwych is very agreeably demonstrating to those who can afford seventeen shillings for an evening’s amusement, the power of good acting. To what extent a piece of good acting can compensate for the badness of the play in which it is exhibited may be seen at the present moment in “One Night in Rome,” in which Miss Laurette Taylor’s careful and intelligent performance has power to render supportable one of the feeblest entertainments of modern times. In the same way M. Sacha Guitry’s little farces, “Nono” and “La Prise de Berg-op-Zoom,” both of them exceedingly clever pieces of third-rate work, are made really delightful by the marvellous accomplishment not only of M. Guitry and Mlle. Printemps, the stars of the company, but also of all the subsidiary actors in the troupe. Bad acting is powerless to spoil completely a good play. If the players know their words and speak them in a fairly audible manner, a good play can be left to itself to make its impression. Some of the most pleasing performances of Shakespeare I have ever witnessed were given by small boys at the Oxford Preparatory School. They knew the speeches and they spoke up: Shakespeare did the rest. And recently we saw how stupidly Tchekov’s “Three Sisters” resisted the most determined assaults of actors and producers, and not merely resisted, but, so to speak, counter-attacked. triumphantly broke through and took the audience by storm.

* * * *

Bad acting, then, cannot kill a good play. Conversely, good acting has ample power to cause a bad play to live and an ordinary, indifferent, slight thing to seem enchanting. “Nono” and “Berg-op-Zoom,” distinguished from the common run of light farces only by being a little cleverer and fresher, seemed masterpieces of originality so long as one was under the spell of the Guitry company’s acting. Patient and intelligent training in a good tradition was responsible for the French players’ triumph. Sandwiched between “Neno” and “Berg-op-Zoom” was the first night of a new English comedy. Comparisons are odious; but then, why be so foolish as to invite them? The note of and, in the worst sense, amateurish performance of the English actors demonstrated that absence of talent plus absence of proper training equals naught. The completely accomplished performance of the French players showed that a person without talent can be made highly competent by education, and that this same education provides an actor of natural gifts with the best vehicle for expressing his own peculiar genius.

* * * *

The French players had at their fingers’ ends—and not merely at their fingers’ but at the extremities of every limb and feature—the whole traditional language of what we may call, if Mr. Boll has not already patented the expression, “significant gesture.” Watching them, one felt that they could, at a pinch, have acted the whole play in dumb show, conveying even the finer shades of meaning without uttering a word. And that surely is the test of skilful acting. The place to see significant gesture as it is developed to its highest pitch is, of course, the music-hall, where the performers must, in order to hold the attention of audiences by their individual effort, possess the greatest natural talents and the most exquisite technique. How much brighter the legitimate theatre would be if it possessed a few more players equal to, say, Marie Lloyd or Frank Tinney; or if anything so accomplished as Little Tich’s compromise between natural gesture and the symbolical gesture of the dance could be seen in it! Charlie Chaplin, in the same way, has devised a symbolism of gesture half way between natural acting and the dance. The Guitry code of gesture, which is simply the French tradition intelligently taught, stands in its turn half way between Charlie Chaplin’s symbolism and nature. It is on the whole the best vehicle of expression for most ordinary purposes of acting.

* * * *

M. Lucien Guitry’s performance in “Pasteur”—a monologue with occasional interruptions—bore out what the first week of the French season had already made plain: that good acting can alchemically change what is bad in a written play to gold upon the stage. Readers of “Pasteur” may be excused for finding the play just a little tedious; but acted by M. Lucien Guitry, it was absorbing. In the same way “Abraham Lincoln,” so melodiously, so dim in the reading, proved when acted to be an excellent stage play. These new chronicle plays, dealing with characters who died, practically, only the day before yesterday, these Pasteurs and Lincolns exhumed in public before their bodies have decently had time to turn to dust—are they not pregnant with disquieting possibilities, do they not add a new terror to death and, developed, a new horror to life? For it is obviously only a matter of a little time before the playwrights, celebrating persons ever nearer and nearer to their own time, begin to write about those who are still alive. And then, weo unto those who are famous enough to be written about! But, on the other hand, what fun for those who do the writing!

* * * *

As a matter of fact, a precedent of the kind was set during the last months of the war, when a Homeric cinematograph film of “Life and Heroes of Action.” Mr. Lloyd George was actually prepared. Unhappily it has, so far as I am aware, never been released. The change of feeling brought about by the coming of the armistice was, perhaps, in part responsible for the suppression of this great work of art. Perhaps, too, a certain unconscious, unintentional irony made itself felt in the midst of the epic... I do not know. But I cannot help being sorry that the film never made its appearance. Many well-known people appeared in it, and it is said that an eminent art critic, whose contributions sometimes honour the pages of The Athenzum, refused a lucrative offer to play the part of Mr. Winston Churchill. My hope is that, when and if Mr. Lloyd George ever goes out of office, the opposition Government which then comes into power will finally release the film—release it with a vengeance and suitably ironic comments between the scenes.

* * * *

And here once catches a Pisgah glimpse of all the rich possibilities of the cinema as an instrument of political propaganda. It has already been used in this way, but only bunglingly, tentatively, on a small scale. At every general election of the future the picture palaces will flicker with propaganda. Each candidate will issue a film showing what he did in the Great War, testifying to his goodness as a husband and father, his kindness, his industry. And another film of his opponent’s life, which, steering cautiously clear of libel, will display Mr. X in infancy, muling and puking, Mr. X receiving chastisement for stealing sweets, Mr. X at school, making a false quantity, Mr. X being sent down from the University for drunkenness, Mr. X among the chorus girls, Mr. X at forty, grown very stout, and so on. In the great days that lie ahead I see prodigious power and wealth awaiting an industrious Guitry, and for Mr. Drinkwater, millions, even a coronet...

AUTOLYCUS.
LITERARY GOSSIP

Mr. Charles M. Doughty, the author of "Arabia Deserta" and more recently of "Mansoul," is to be the degree of D.Litt. Mr. Edmund Gosse will be similarly honoured on the same occasion.

We learn from Messrs. Macmillan that a second impression of Mr. Festing Jones' "Life of Samuel Butler" will be shortly ready for publication. Although, as we indicated in our review, we do not think the book adds to Butler's own reputation, it is undoubtedly one of the most interesting biographies published in our time. The second edition will contain portraits of Miss Savage and Alfred Cathie; those who, like ourselves, possess the first will be glad to hear that they can obtain these additional portraits from the publishers by sending them a P.O. for two shillings.

"The Reign of Patti" is the title given by Mr. Herman Klein to his forthcoming biography of the great singer who died last September. It has been for some time in the press, and will be published this month in New York by the Century Company, whose summer catalogue describes it as "the authorized biography of Adelina Patti." It is dedicated to her husband, Baron Gederstrom, with whose aid the author completed the final details of a task that has occupied most of his leisure time since 1914. The illustrations extend over the entire range of the famous diva's repertoire, and include reproductions of several little-known early photographs of her in operatic costume.

We understand that the limited edition on fine paper of the collected poems of Mr. Walter de la Mare, shortly to be published by Messrs. Constable, is already wholly subscribed for by the booksellers. The Millstock edition of Mr. Hardy's works (Macmillan) was likewise snapped up by the booksellers long before publication.

It is, of course, inevitable that these books will be at a premium shortly. The quality of Mr. Hardy as a major artist, and of Mr. de la Mare as a minor one, is durable. They are therefore a gilt-edged investment for the bibliophile. But the demand for limited editions and the productions of private presses at the present time is not restricted to gilt-edged securities. It might almost be advisable to begin a series of notes for modern bibliophiles in THE ATHENEUM. If there are still a number of bargains to be made, there are more investments to be avoided.

Book-prices at the present moment are decidedly erratic. We have long been searching for a good set of Sir Walter Scott's eighteen-volume edition of Dryden's works (1808) in the booksellers' catalogues we could find nothing under £10. A week or so ago we found in the Publishers' Circular "Dryden, 18 vols. (1808), boards, 25s." That number of the Circular was a week old, and we naturally imagined that the book had been immediately sold. Still, we made the inquiry, and to our intense gratification found it to be a fine set in packeted cal. Yet it had stood six days in the Circular at 15d. a volume.

Mr. Humphrey Milford sends us three sets of pictorial postcards printed at the Oxford University Press for the British Museum, the price of which is 2½d. per set. Each set contains fifteen cards and is sold in a stout envelope for 1s. In particular we would recommend to everyone for the purposes of correspondence the marvellous series of Blake drawings and designs. People are inclined to forget the pleasure they may give to the most sophisticated correspondent by sending their message on the back of an exquisite reproduction of a masterpiece; they give him a little oasis of contemplation amid the desert of bills and business. For ourselves, we always experience a little shock of gratitude to one of our own friends who has this delightful habit. Nowadays, when a plain postcard costs a halfpenny, it must be one of the cheapest, as it is certainly one of the most genuine, pleasures we can bestow. Besides the Blake drawings, there is a set of miniatures from the Psalter of King Henry VI., and an alphabet of ornamental initials from English MSS. of the twelfth century.

"Frederick Locker Lampson: a Character Sketch," by the Rt. Hon. Augustine Birrell, will be published by Messrs. Constable on the 1st of June. Mr. Birrell is one of the most original contemporary writers, and has contributed to a critical and biographical dissertation a selection of letters received by Frederick Locker from Leigh Hunt, O. W. Holmes, Robert Browning, Tennant, Thackeray, Ruskin, Calverley, Froude, Matthew Arnold, Cruikshank, Dickens, Rossetti, Walt Whitman, Henley, R.L.S., Thomas Hardy, and others. The book concludes with a careful annotation of the principal books of the Rowland Library collected by Locker. The volume is illustrated with a photogravure reproduction of Du Maurier's portrait of Locker, two colour plates (Eleanor Locker after a contemporary water-colour and the Rowlant Quarts by Kate Greenaway), and three pages of book-plates belonging to the Locker family. A limited edition on hand-made paper signed by Mr. Birrell will also be issued.

UNIT-CONCEPTS IN BIOLOGY

Monographs on Experimental Biology—The Physical Basis of Heredity. By T. H. Morgan. Inbreeding and Outbreeding. By E. M. East and D. F. Jones. (Lippincott, 10s. 6d. net each.)

In various parts of the East there may be seen great temples, finely planned and richly decorated, which have been carved out of the solid rock. But this monolithic architecture is rare; it never has been, nor ever can be, of great importance. For man to erect what his will desires and his imagination conceives, he must first learn to make and to employ units of building. In science, such monolithic carvings-out of solid reality by impatient mind have been commoner than their architectural counterparts, but will as inevitably be supplanted by the use of units.

The perfection, since the time of Dalton, of the unit-concepts of molecules, atoms, ions, and electrons, has constituted by far the most potent factor in the recent progress of the physo-chemical sciences, and has afforded the basis of great syntheses such as the theory of gases and of solutions, the energy concept, and the periodic law.

Biology is now reaching her Daltonian period. She is discovering her units, shaping them, polishing them, learning how to fit them together. The progress of our knowledge of biological units dates from the first half of the nineteenth century, when the cell-theory was first laid down. In the second half of the century the cell was in its turn dissected. The conception of the chromosomes as units within the cell-nucleus, each self-perpetuating, each with its own individuality, was then established. Finally, the twentieth century has already seen the chromosomes resolved into more convenient frameworks for the huge aggregations of still smaller units or genes which appear to be the essential realities at the base of the visible structure. It is like the diminishing sequence of units in chemistry—molecule, atom, electron.

Professor Morgan's book is a statement of our present knowledge as to the nature of these hypothetical units within the chromosomes, and of the evidence that exists for identifying them with Mendelian unit-factors. He and his school of workers have been the principal agents in discovering this evidence, which, though many are still unconvinced, gets stronger day by day, and will in a short time, we have no doubt, win general acceptance.

Through his labours of research and interpretation, we can now get a new view of organisms, a new mental model of the processes of heredity. We can see every species and every individual as the result of the interaction, during development, of the external environment with a great number of inheritable unit-factors or genes. These are located in a linear series along the chromosomes. Thus every organism contains two complete series of genes, one from its father, the other from its mother, which are, for purposes of convenient handling, cut up into a fixed number of chromosomes, each containing a particular portion of the gene-series, and each, therefore, with its own characteristic size and shape.

The genes are thus inherited in groups, each group corresponding to a chromosome; but owing to a peculiar process known as crossing-over, the linkage between the members of a single group is not absolute, being greater as the two genes are closer together in the chromosome. Two lines of advance are thus opened up. We can in the first place set out to construct chromosome maps (not on a reduced scale, like the Ordnance Survey, but vastly magnified) on which the relative position of all known genes can be plotted; and, as a matter of fact, such a map for that classical object in genetics, the pomace-fly Drosophila, greets the visitor to Morgan's laboratory. And secondly, we can try to discover how this predetermined internal structure...
chromosomes to heredity. He knows by experience how rapidly our knowledge enlarges and our views are modified in genetics... and as a result has been content not to round off his subject, not to pursue or link up the fascinating side-issues and speculations that open out on every side. That, however, the intelligent reader can do for himself; and there can be no hesitation in recommending both books to those desirous of following progress in genetical science.

SOCIETIES

GEOLICAL.—May 5.—Mr. G. W. Lamplugh, Vice-President, in the chair.

Dr. W. B. Bryan, G. Rudd Collinson, A. C. Gardner, Trevor Starkey (of Nelson, British Columbia), and E. A. Allen were elected Fellows.

The communication read was on "A Natural 'Eolith' Factory beneath the Thanet Sand," by Mr. S. Hazeldine Warren, describing a section in the Bulleid Head at Graves where the conditions have been favourable for the chipping of the flints by subaerial pressure.

In the author's opinion the section affords the most complete and conclusive evidence hitherto obtained in support of the theory of the origin of the supposed Eolithic implements by purely natural agencies. The views put forward were criticized at considerable length by Mr. H. Dewey, Mr. Reginald Smith, Sir Henry Howorth, Mr. H. Bury, Mr. Walter Johnson, Mr. A. S. Kennard, Mr. A. L. Leach, Mr. J. F. X. Green, and Mr. F. X. Haward.

ZOOLOGICAL.—May 11.—Professor J. P. Hill, Vice-President, in the chair.

The Secretary read a report on the additions to the menagerie during April.

On behalf of Messrs. E. Gerrard & Sons, Mr. R. J. Pocock exhibited a mounted specimen of a pale variety of the white-bearded gnu (Connochaetes albojubatus), shot by Capt. Keith Caldwell in Masaiahland.—Miss J. B. Proctor exhibited and made remarks on a living specimen of the trilled trachonius, Spelar polys fusca, Bonaparte, born on May 8, 1920.—Professor J. E. Du Ruex exhibited a remarkable series of lantern-slides illustrating the sexual display and nesting-habits of the ostrich.

Mr. W. J. Hakin communicated his paper on "Flora of Western Australia: III. Further Contributions to the Study of the Onychophora"; and illustrated his remarks by lantern-slides and microscopic specimens, showing points in the structure of Peripatus.—Mr. Forster-Cooper gave a résumé of his paper "Chalcidoidea from Baluchistan," illustrated by specimens.

struggle for quality. A room, like a garden, can only be kept in order by continual weeding. There are two main data, affection and efficiency. If there is any pot or pan you really love, go on keeping it till you don't, but wash it and put it, "keeps nothing you do not know to be useful or believe to be beautiful." The recent over-use of the words "art" and "artistic" has led to some insincerities, and at this time it would be better, I think, to aim at being scientific in both our house building and furnishing. Beware of much ornament, especially of the machine-made sort. Merely routine ornament is quite a disease, a surface eruption which is often repulsive.

Another point: the buying of old furniture, the pawnshop ideal of furnishing, has been overdone; it has encouraged dealing and discouraged making. A fine piece of old furniture is, of course, a delightful possession if you have it, or if it "comes to you," but the right thing now must certainly be the encouragement of living makers; further, you will thus escape the danger of buying sham antiques. Some time ago I saw in a shop a carved chest labelled "saved from Ypres" and all scorched by fire. It had been made antique with a sandblast, and burned by a lamp.

Some admirable experiments in the making of cottage furniture are being made at the L.C.C. Furniture School in Shoreditch. For small rooms it is desirable to get things for corner positions, where they are more out of the way.

The first aim in decoration should be to brighten and stimulate. Decoration which adds to gloom would be better undone. As decorum is something beyond utility, it should be good of its kind, and a little that is good goes a long way. Not only is one good picture worth a thousand bad ones, but they are a positive balance on the wrong side. Aim at quality, at cheerfulness and brightness. The use of much white is not merely a fad; a white room is much lighter than if otherwise coloured and it looks larger. I should like to have two rooms arranged at an exhibition, one with whitened walls and a few averagely good things, the other covered with a deep crimson paper and other objects "to match." Everyone would, I believe, feel the stimulus of the former. It is sometimes argued that dark tints don't show the inevitable dirt, but to some extent all dirt is bad, and that it shall not show more dirt is doubtful policy. A not too dirty fair room looks cleaner than a very gloomy one.

Do not allow any blue to be put into white for ceilings, rather a touch of yellow to make it slightly creamy. Greys, buffs, and fair yellows (not hot) are all good for painting; also some greens, but these require judgment. Black occasionally, as in skirtsing, is sharp and clean without being frowzy. Arrangements of any two of these are likely to be pretty safe. In the case of painted chimney pieces and the like it is good policy to paint the flat part of the shelf red or black—just the flat without any thickness. The edges of doors might very well be painted in the same way differently from the surfaces. Graining of woodwork might well be brought back if the graining was not imaginative but frankly ornamental, and not in beery browns but in simple gay colours. Wall-papers should be fair in colour, with the pattern distributed all over and not in bunches. Beware of all extremes like the Viennese black-and-white chequers lately so much in vogue. Beware, too, of purple—a mourning colour. Distemper washes are good, and some of them take varnish very well and make an excellent surface. There is a custom of hanging pictures too high; if they are not good enough to be seen, banish them still further. Finally, I would suggest that enough use is not made of our Schools of Art. Picked students might be employed in decorating houses with interesting personal work if they would take an oath to be simple, sane and sweet, and not acid, frantic and sad.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

LEICESTER GALLERIES.—Memorial Exhibition of the Works of Camille Pissarro.

PAWSON AND CARFAX GALLERY.—Stone Carvings by Jean Milne.

ALPINE CLUB GALLERY.—The Russian Revolution, seen and depicted by Edward Saltoff.

BLACK GALLERY.—Paintings and Water-Colour Drawings of the South Downs by Adam Slade.

HAMPSTEAD ART GALLERY.—Drawings and Paintings by Clara Klinghoffer.

The first and dominant impression at the Pissarro Memorial Exhibition is amazement that these unobtrusive pictures ever had the power to excite indignant protest and violent abuse; the second is amazement that they also called forth passions of dithyrambic praise. The whole of Pissarro's life is a recognition of their real and incontrovertible merit. After studying this representative collection we are forced to the conclusion that Camille Pissarro's work may be destined to outlive that of several of his gifted and popular colleagues. Many of the other Impressionists, as pioneers, were inevitably doctrinaire, hypothetical and extremist. Pissarro was fundamentally sober and, we imagine, always a little sceptical of enthusiasm. He threw in his lot with the Impressionists not because he believed their doctrines to be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, but because he realized that they opened the gate to a vast untilled field, and he decided to pitch his tent in this field because it offered him a pragmatic solution of the harassing problems of what to paint and how to paint it, without sacrifice of personal dignity or concessions to materialism. Owing to this absence of fanaticism in his work he is apt to appear the dull dog of the Impressionist troupe. He appears dull compared with Monet because he could not accept the spectrum palette, pointillism, the paramount claim of light and so on as constituting a finite religion in themselves, and his temperament prevented his adopting a completely conventional formula of expression. He appears a dull dog compared with Manet because he had nothing of their triumphant virtuosity. He never convinced us that he was a born painter. We always felt a suspension that his technique was possibly nothing but an intellectually evolved substitute for talent. It is always evident that he arrived at good painting more by hard work than by instinct. He appears a dull dog, too, compared with Renoir, because he was not the fortunate heir to the Galatia of Fragonard and Boucher, and he made no obvious response in his art to the appeal of purely charming and sensual aspects. But the very qualities which make him appear relatively dull are the qualities which may ensure the permanence of his art. His scepticism enabled him to keep an intermittent but quite perceptible and most valuable hold on constructive possibility; his lack of facility imposed upon his disastrous concentration that could only be maintained by moral pressure, and his freedom from specifically French sensibility helped him to keep his art comparatively severe. Both Pissarro and Renoir foreshadowed the subsequent reaction against the theory of Impressionism—Renoir by a great natural instinct for art, Pissarro by temperamental moderation and common sense; and it seems at least possible that these two Impressionists will make the greatest appeal to our descendants.

Mr. I. W. Brooks, who is clearly a young man of unusual talent, makes a most promising début at the adjacent Burlington Gallery. His work is delicate and assured. There is a wealth in it and Markant and Nicholas is a personal factor as well, which exploits the influences with an almost disconcerting facility. "Rain at High Tide" and "The Green Gate" are both delightful solutions of minor problems, but Mr. Brooks would, perhaps, be well advised to spend an hour in the Pissarro exhibition and realize the value of patient research and continuous effort.

HUMAN SCENERY

One of the chief points of interest about the Glastonbury school of opera is that it is a place where experiments can be tried. It has no traditions to which public opinion might oblige it to conform; it is trammeled only by its physical limitations. But for the artistic imagination, limitations are often a stimulus to creative experiment. There are some temperaments to which such limitations are always a hindrance. Some composers like to feel that inspiration need take no thought for practical convenience; if it occurs to them in the middle of a work that they would like to hear a certain phrase played by six trumpets, six trumpets they must have, even though they are never wanted again. To others the necessity for cutting and contriving presents a positive attraction. People who would be simply bewildered by the knowledge that they could have absolutely anything they wanted in the way of materials will find that when they are called upon to work with the scantiest of resources they are thereby stimulated to real originality. If resources are limited, the artist is obliged to concentrate attention on absolute essentials. He is obliged, indeed, to analyse his own mind and come to a decision as to what really is absolutely essential. He must think out definitely what he wants to express and how it is to be expressed. This, one would imagine, was the obvious duty of every artist, whether his materials be scanty or plentiful. But artists are as reluctant to think as ordinary people, and a large number of them consider that their function as artists is not to think, but to feel.

One of Mr. Rutland Boughton's first ideas for the Glastonbury theatre was to use an orchestral chorus in his operas as well as the chorus on the stage. This was an example of feeling rather than of thinking. But in the Glastonbury Assembly Room there was no room for an orchestral chorus; there was no room for an orchestra at all, even if the players could have been provided. Elaborate scenery was also out of the question, and for most of the productions the limits of what could be used had been set down. But here ingenuity came to the rescue, and it occurred to Mr. Boughton to make use of the chorus singers themselves to give a suggestion of scenery. He does not seem at present to have worked out any very consistent method of employing his "human scenery," but he has tried a number of experiments on a small scale, most of which will be seen at the forthcoming performances at the "Old Vic."

The most daring adventure in this direction was the opening of "The Birth of Arthur," which I saw at Glastonbury in the summer of 1915. The scene is supposed to represent Tintagel Castle. There was a background of dark curtains. A group of men in brown and grey stood at one side, some with arms held above their heads, to represent the castle, while a group of women in blue and green crouched below, partly on steps, to represent the sea. Both groups sang, and the women executed various movements which were quite effectively suggestive of waves. As far as I remember, they generally remained low down in the foreground, crouching, kneeling, or moving with bent figures, so as to make a contrast with the tall, upstanding outlines of the men.

There was no attempt to make the men look like an actual castle. These walls had neither plaster nor loam nor roughest cast about them. They had their own movements, and when the main characters came in to act the real drama, the walls subsided and the castle retired into the background—

FROM BOSTON AND NEW YORK

We have received the most recent Bulletins published by the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and the Metropolitan Museum of New York. The latter is now celebrating its Fiftieth Anniversary by a special exhibition which includes some sixty first-rate paintings loaned by private collectors. Among recent treasures acquired for the permanent collection, we note (a) a Chinese T'ang Kanshitsu figure, reported to have been found under the remains of the Tai Fu Szü temple in Ch'eng ting fu (province of Chihli), which has apparently suffered little from ill-considered repairs; the Bulletin gives no indication of its size; (b) a conversation piece by Hogarth, "The Price Family," painted about 1741, which was in the possession of the Price family until 1893, when it appears to have been sold by auction; the Metropolitan Museum has acquired it by recent purchase. The Boston Museum has been enriched by a notable Italian painting, a "Madonna and Child with St. Jerome" by Fiorenzo di Lorenzo, presented by Mrs. W. Scott Fitz. The Museum Bulletin prints a photograph of this work and promises comment in a subsequent issue. Foreign readers would appreciate a description of the size, colouring and so on, which appear from the photograph to be similar to our Saling Bequest. Glastonbury, presented by Mrs. Fitz. In the Boston picture the Child stands on a parapet (as in our own) supported by the Virgin, who stands behind. Her mantle partially envelopes His body and drapes the parapet. St. Jerome's head and hand appear behind the Virgin's left shoulder. There is a landscape background. The picture is said to be in an excellent state of preservation.

Thus have I, Wall, my part discharged so;
And, being done, thus Wall away doth go.

Mr. Boughton was not the first dramatist to think of a human wall, but in any case this attempt to suggest masonry by means of men was an uncompromising assertion of a new principle in serious opera. The waves were to my thinking more effective as a living decoration, but that may well have been because they were less challenging to one's preconceived ideas. It was easy to accept them as nymphs or maidens who would have been nothing at all unusual in a romantic opera. Indeed, several of Mr. Boughton's further experiments in this direction have been nothing more than personifications of the customary type. In his ballet "The Moon-maiden" he says that it is "the dancers and not the gauzes or steam-pipes that produce the ideas of clouds and mist." "The Moon-maiden" is a most charming and poetical little composition which certainly does not require steam-pipes for its presentation. As for the gauzes, there are plenty of them, disposed on the persons of the young ladies. And a chorus of clouds is older even than the human wall. Again, in "The Immortal Hour" the idea of the forest is suggested by the trees themselves. It is impossible to avoid such choruses and dances as these as "human scenery." They certainly fulfil the function of scenery to this extent—that when there is no scenery, the choruses of nymphs or dryads serves very adequately to give the desired impression; but one could imagine Mr. Boughton's opera produced in the conventional manner without any difficulty. Realistic scenery would not make these choruses superfluous. They have a musical and a poetical function as well. The personification of natural forces sets the spectator at once in the atmosphere of romance in a way that no paint and canvas by itself could ever do. In "The Round Table," performed last summer at the Round Theatre, in fact the combination of human and painted scenery. Merlin's tomb was a piece of scenery, and there were canvas wings with flags and bulrushes painted on them, while in the foreground on the steps were grouped a number of nymphs attending on the Lady of the Lake.

A much more original employment of human scenery was shown in "The Sumida River." This is a Japanese play set to music by Clarence Reynbould. The scene represents the Sumida River, with a boat going across it. At Glastonbury the boat remains fixed at one side of the stage, and the river is represented by six women dressed in blue, who at first stand motionless along the back curtain. When the boat is supposed to start they proceed at something between a walk and a run, with various motions of the arms as well, across the back of the stage from left to right, returning—certainly more at a run than at a walk—behind the curtain and crossing again in front, so as to give the impression of a continuous procession of figures. This went on for about ten minutes, during which one of the characters in the boat has a lengthy monologue. Something analogous to this was done at the Surrey Theatre recently in the last act of "Walküre"; the flames lit by Wotan were represented by a row of ladies standing behind a piece of scenery and waving gauze scarves above their heads in a red light. At a greater distance this might well have made quite an effective illusion; as it was, one was not quite sure whether it was intended as a chorus of tree-spirits. About Mr. Boughton's river and castle there is no doubt. At present there is some temptation to mirth, especially for anyone who has taken part in rehearsals, or stood behind the scenes and watched the waves scurrying round at the back—one hot afternoon at Glastonbury only five turned up instead of six, which necessitated a considerable quickening-up of the tempo. But the opening of "The Birth of Arthur" was genuinely impressive; and what matters is not that one should find the idea comic at times, but that one should have ever admitted, if only for a few bars, that it succeeded in its intentions. If it was successful and impressive at any one moment, that moment can be seized and amplified. Human scenery is at present an undeveloped idea; but it certainly has possibilities of very interesting elaboration, and for that reason no scenic designer or producer should neglect the performances to be given next month.

CONCERTS

The Bohemian Czech Quartet wandered a long way from their native heath on May 17, when their programme included the string quartets of Ravel and César Franck. Of the two, we should certainly have prophesied that the latter would have been more amenable to their style and method, but we should have been wrong. The Ravel they gave us was not the Ravel we know best, roguish and elusive; it was the tender and appealing Ravel whom the other one rarely more than half conceals, though he tries desperately hard to smugle him out of sight altogether. It is the former who is the most exciting of all conductors, pianists and singers alike, and there is no need to complain because our friends the Bohemians prefer to enjoy the society of Jekyll without admitting the existence of Hyde. We can always make a mental reservation. Their Franck was less convincing as a piece of interpretation, and it also revealed some unsuspected technical weaknesses.

Mr. ARCHY ROSENTHAL at his pianoforte recital on May 18 played a set of pieces by J. Leo Pavlova "in the Viennese idiom," which means that they more or less resembled Tausig's transcriptions of Strauss or the morceaux de salon of Schuhoff. Had it not been for the mention of Pavlova among their titles, one would have imagined them to have been composed half a century ago. Mr. Rosenthal very cleverly succeeded in giving them a certain kind of a general idea, and they were carried along in a painstakingly sentimental manner, in the rest of his programme he was anything but sentimental; his style is cold, accurate and precise, admirable in its lucidity, but making no great appeal either to emotion or to intellect.

Mr. BRONISLAW HUBERMAN, on May 19, gave the second of his two recitals devoted to Bach's unaccompanied violin sonatas, which he played with real loveliness and dignity of expression. Programmes devoted to Bach's music are not generally to be recommended, and it might be thought that an afternoon of Bach sonatas would be more monotonous than a pianist's Chopin programme; but these works positively gain by being played consecutively. They are wonderfully varied in form and style, and the entire absence of the pianoforte throughout the whole programme enabled the player to get into the right frame of mind for appreciating their beauties. One ceases to regard them as tours de force either of the composer's or of the player's technique, and listens to them simply for the musical thought which they express.

Mr. JASCHA HEIFETZ played the Chaconne at his recital the same afternoon, but in this case it was merely a triumph of dexterity. His technical skill is enormous, and his tone always exquisite, though small, but he fails to show any marked individuality as an interpreter. At his age, one naturally would not expect maturity of understanding; but even the obvious exuberance of the Mendelssohn concerto failed to arouse in him playing any expression of enthusiasm.

MISS MYRA HESS is certainly one of the half-dozen best of present-day English pianists, and her playing is too well known for her recital to demand a criticism. She prefers the more spacious masters, the Bachs and Francks, and it is always from them that her programmes are largely drawn. But she is no pedant, and on May 20 she showed us that she can tackle Albeniz and Debussy with the best of them; indeed, her playing of "Ce qu'a vu le vent d'Ouest" was the most remarkable thing of the evening. We knew it for a piece of gusty impressionism, but we never suspected that such a crashing, cataclysmic force was there until Miss Hess showed it to us. Perhaps it was she who put it there.
MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

The New York Symphony Orchestra gave their first European concert in Paris on May 16. Under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, they played the "Eroica" Symphony, Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture, Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, some fragments of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," and (inevitably) the "Marseillaise" to begin with, and the "Star-Spangled Banner" at the end, so that, whatever the rest of the music may have been, there was no mistaking the definitely national flavour of the "hors d'œuvre" and dessert. Mr. Damrosch is, however, an able and experienced conductor who knows thoroughly what he is about, and has his forces well in hand. Some of his tempi in the Beethoven rather startled the Parisian musical public, but otherwise his readings were impersonal and straightforward, and the ensemble was exactly inspired. The orchestra is remarkably well-disciplined, and the tone of the brass and woodwind in particular very brilliant, but their playing as a whole is a little inclined to be rigid, after the manner of a military band. None the less they are a first-class body of instrumentalists, and gave fine performances of such very different works as the difficult "Daphnis et Chloé" and (at their second concert) Dvorák's "New World" Symphony. Mr. Albert Spalding, who played with them at their second concert, is a really fine violinist whom one can praise without reserve. He seems to possess all the essential qualities of the ideal executant—interpretation, flawless technical control, a fine tone and breadth of style. One would like, therefore, to hear him playing something other than Saint-Saëns' Third Concerto, which, however effective it may be from the violinist's point of view, does not give the hearer much opportunity to judge the inner musicality or interpretive powers of the soloist.

Amongst other recent concerts of foreign music the most noteworthy have been that of the "Hague Quartet" (April 26) and one consisting entirely of works by modern Finnish composers (May 13). The Dutch players, who form an admirable ensemble, performed for the first time in Paris works by modern Dutch composers, of which the most interesting were a Piano Trio by Alexandre Voormolen, and a string quartet by B. Van den Sigtenhorst-Meyer, in the form of a Suite written round various episodes in the life of Jesus. The composer has not attempted to write programme-music to illustrate, e.g., "The Adoration of the Magi" or "Jesus chasing the merchants from the Temple," but he has allowed himself to be inspired by the idea of these scenes, and the result is some very sincere, original, and at times beautiful music.

The Finnish concert was a disappointment. This is the case when we are being introduced to "national art." Apart from Sibelius, Palmgren would seem to be the most important of the moderns, and his piano concerto ("Le Fleuve"), skilfully played by M. Ihmari Hannikainen, is certainly interesting and individual, if unequal. Of the orchestral works the best movements of a suite by M. Toivo Kunn, entitled (on the French programme) "Il pleut dans la forêt" and "L'esprit dans les bois," M. Robert Kajanus, who conducted the orchestra, played his own "Sonnetta," which struck us as ponderous and rather academic, and, in view of its great length, quite undervalue the diminuendo of the diminuendo, and rather academic, the other "new" composers, who appeared as writers of songs, were Erkki Melartin and L. Matedaga.

Of "Pulcinella," which was produced by the Russian ballet at the Opéra on May 15, space forbids us now to give a detailed criticism. It will perhaps suffice to say that the ballet was something of a surprise to those who were expecting to be surprised. The music is much more Pergolesi than Stravinsky, and the choreography shows no advance on that of, e.g., "The Good-Humoured Ladies," to which, indeed, after a first sight and hearing, we are inclined to consider the new ballet inferior. Picasso's "décors," however, is very good, and his costumes pretty and satisfying. The Pergolesi 2s is said to have been sung by Stravinsky in the Naples Library, and dated 1790. These are vocal parts just well as which are sung by three singers placed in the orchestra. The music is very good of its kind, and has been allowed to preserve almost all its eighteenth-century character.

M. GUSTRY THE GREATER

ALDWYCH THEATRE.— "Pasteur," Pièce en 5 Actes de M. Sacha Guitry.

R EVIEWING Huysmans's "Soures Vatard" in a volume dated 1880, Zola predicted that the novel of the future would dispense with a plot. "On finira par donner de simples études, sans péripéties ni dénomément, l'analyse d'une âme d'existence, l'historie d'une passion, la biographie d'un personnage; les notes prises sur la vie et logiquement classées." The novelists have not shown themselves inclined to follow this formula of naturalism, and attempt no more than a collection of notes taken on life, and Zola himself as he aged only stuck deeper and deeper in melodrama. It is all the more surprising then to find this recipe, or something like it, suddenly applied to the stage, the very last place where it could be expected to succeed. What makes M. Guitr's "Pasteur" as fresh as his "Nono" was shop-soiled is the boldness with which this experiment is made. It is simply "la biographie d'un personnage," or some cuttings from a biography. We are shown the figure of Pasteur in five attitudes, five significant moments of his life, and that is all. The attempt at a plot, no crises, no conflict, and, except for the superficial fact that Pasteur carries a heavier load of official honours at the end of the play than at the beginning, there is no climax. The cinema has occasionally ventured to treat a career in this way, but then the cinema has special facilities. On the stage such an experiment would appear faredomed.

Yet the strange fact is that it succeeds. And, stranger still, what succeeds is the method rather than the work. "Pasteur" is not a _tour de force_ that wins its way by sheer brilliance in spite of its unsuitableness for its medium. On the contrary, it is a rather mediocre work, which remains interesting just because it is suggestive of what might be done in its kind. It shows that we can be deprived of a great deal which we have grown to look upon as essential to drama and not feel the loss of it a bit. A few scenes taken almost haphazardly from life, if only they are alive, are enough. It is really possible to do without structure. Playwrights will be quick to make use of this lesson—and to abuse it. But the lesson has been taught and will not be forgotten. For that M. Sacha Guitr deserves our thanks.

When we come to consider "Pasteur" no longer as a genre, but as a specimen of its genre, we cannot help being reminded again of Zola. We recall those "Savans" (avec un grand S), as Léon Daudet calls them, who in "Pasteur" and the "Quatre Evangiles" open their great heart in words, announce that this excess of misery is about to end, mount the promontories of Montmartre, and melt at the spectacle of the sun setting in its glory." They are loquacious, dogmatic, intolerant, puffed up with deceit, everything that a scholar ought not to be; they never give any evidence of the powers on which they pride themselves; and yet they are undeniably impressive. To this breed belongs the Pasteur of M. Guitr. He may not mount the promontories of Montmartre to proclaim his moralism, but that is because he finds a pedestal everywhere. The Sorbonne, the tribune of the Academy of Medicine, his laboratory, his class-room, his domestic armchair, are all one to him; he is always on Sinai. He only wavers once, and that is when he is called upon to do something, to have an actual sick child inoculated with one of his infallible remedies. But with the help of a doctor and an assistant he manages to pull through somehow; and by the next scene he is older, indeed, but as sure of his unique value to the world as ever. Is this a fair portrait of the true Pasteur? Or is it perhaps the only way of presenting a man of science on the stage? M. Sacha Guitry is a brave challenger of convention, but not even he could make the real work of a scientist an entertaining spectacle. There are things, it seems, after all that the stage cannot touch.

And yet these savants of fiction and the theatre are, as we said, impressive. They are more impressive even than the stage priest, and without the help of a purple cassock and a shopful of rosaries. If you are moved (as most people are) by Le Docteur Pascal and Bertheroy, you will be much more moved by this bluff, gruff, single-minded, large-hearted Pasteur. And you will not be to blame, for there is a magician in the business. That magician is M. Lucien Guitry. It would be impossible, even if the attempt were feasible, to take to pieces his wonderful impersonation, to sort out and reckon up all the sure and delicate strokes that make it so thorough, so convincing. Just consider his way of taking up a book (a thing that hardly any actor can do plausibly), and note that he handles it exactly as a scholar and no one else handles a book. That small incident—it comes somewhere in Act IV.—is a study in itself and an index to M. Guitry’s methods. Multiply and enlarge it; and you have the lecture scene of Act II., where, standing at a desk alone, in front of a backcloth, M. Guitry, with a “voice” or two from the front of the house to give him his cues, conducts the whole of a stormy scene of the Academy. When he has done you not only think you have heard his lecture, when you have not, but you feel you have been taken on in the ugly rush of the protesters at the finish. The only person obviously not exhausted is M. Guitry. He has, to put it vulgarly, been playing it on his head. He knows exactly what has to be done and the moment at which to do it. It is one little touch deftly laid on top of another, unerringly and with absolute ease. Enlarge your scale again, and you have the whole five acts, which are simply a monologue for the single character. If M. Guitry stumbled once, if he ran out of petty cash for a moment, and repeated himself, the spell would be broken. But that he never does. The course is mapped out, the supplies assured, and he reaches his goal in as perfect condition as when he set out. M. Pasteur is not only a wonderful performance, but an inestimable lesson in the art of acting.

BACK TO EXOTICA AGAIN

Daly’s Theatre.—“A Southern Maid.” By Dion Clayton Calthrop and Harry Graham. Music by Harold Fraser-Simson.

T HE English party arriving!” cries Dolores in her Southern orange-garden—and what a thrilling cue that is to us elderly gentlemen! In the classic days of Dalydom there was always an “English party.” Once (according to Mr. Rutland Barrington’s memoirs) it got lost in the chaos of rehearsals and did not make its appearance even on the first night, but that was unusual. Normally it arrived, anything but travel-stained, in that wonderful land (we think called Exotica) where the foliage would make the tropics turn pale with envy, and it is always sunshine—even at midnight on the spot where the heroine stands—and marble is the only building material, and nobody was ever long-sighted enough to catch a glimpse of his own ceiling. A pleasant land, Exotica, in the glamour of reminiscence! What dressmakers in the humblest village! What women to wear the dresses they made! No wonder the naval officer, who always led the landing-party from England, used to vow that he must take away the one with the nicest frocks and the sweetest voice. No wonder the local potentate would threaten reprisals and carry them out upon the “merryman moping mum,” who was sometimes the officer’s body-servant, and sometimes a native of the locality, but always, to judge from his conversation, suffered from the delusion that he was living in the Old Kent Road. Happy days!

And yet days that can be recalled! They are recalled at the moment of writing. The English party has come back across the ultramarine sea. It is to South America this time, but the girls are as fair as ever, and the costumes, if anything, more glowing. The naval officer is there, and in good voice, in the person of Mr. Claude Flemming; the belle of Exotica is there, endowed by Miss Josi Collins with a good deal more temperament and character and local colour than there is any real need for, but proportionately more fascinating to watch, and singing so well and with so little strain that we grudge her a minute or two to rest between songs. We miss, indeed, the impassive potentate with his single hour of unbending in topical verse, because, although there are three pyramids at Gizeh, there is only one Rutland Barrington in all the lands of musical comedy; but we have as substitute a stately sort of brigand with a vendetta, who gives Mr. Bertram Wallis scope for a capital piece of burlesque acting. Lastly, we get, of course, the merryman (keeping the worst inn in Santiago), perhaps rather a shadow of his past spontaneity and wit, and yet made amusing enough by Mr. Mark Lester. All of them do exactly what we knew, and they knew, they ought to do. The English party has arrived, and earned its welcome.

There was once another party at Daly’s—a party, if we recollect right, from Vienna. The war chased them away. It is not the libretto to the “Southern Maid” nor Mr. Fraser-Simson’s music that makes us think of them. They come back unbidden to memory. Some people disliked them immensely; others, when they went, missed the undeniable corrupt charm of their pieces and their music. The English party, when it came back again, seemed just a trifle stolid and middle-aged. Criticism means confession, and we must confess, for our part, that even beneath the fervid skies of Exotica we sometimes wish that Herr Lehar could be returned to us, say via Poland. If for no other reason, we would welcome it for this one: it would give Miss Josi Collins some parts worth her playing.

DUMAS WITH A DIFFERENCE

Haymarket Theatre.—"A Marriage of Convenience." By Alexandre Dumas. Adapted by Sydney Grundy.

A COMEDY in four acts by Alexandre Dumas, declares the programme. Is it possible? And which Dumas can it be, the father or the son? It seems too moral for the first, and not to have been moral enough for the second. "Adapted," the programme adds, "by Sydney Grundy." We wonder whether Mrs. Grundy hadn’t a hand in it.

Anyhow, we can fix its period. (We had hoped Mr. Dickinson’s new book on "The Contemporary Drama of England" would give us its date, but it fails us.) This in its present form belongs to the eighties, we vow, or the early nineties. Comte and Comtesse and Chevalier, gentleman’s gentleman and chambermaid—the last two needed of course to explain the position at the opening. The position is simple. M. le Comte has married Madame la Comtesse (fresh from her convent, as you guessed) according to only a engagement made by his uncle. Madame, who has never met this husband provided for her, has an amouret with the foppish Chevalier de Valclos—red heels (the husband’s) to play and mate in three acts. Finding no more characters on the programme, you know the issue will not be complicated. Secure, after a scene or two, of Mrs. Grundy’s collaboration, you know that it is the Chevalier who will get his marching orders. Curtseys,

THE DIFFICULTIES OF CRITICISM

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—With reference to Mr. Swinnerton’s article in your last week’s issue, it seems to be obvious that a craftsman’s criticism is of supreme importance to the craftsman. The review by a reviewer, or, alternatively, the popular, critical, may be useful to the general public. I have never read any in English that could be—but it may be that some get written.) A good “critique” is a work of art, and so constructive. It reveals the writer’s temperament, and as such may be of value; but it won’t help artist or layman much, beyond that. But Napoleon’s remarks on the strategy of Beradotte; or Flaubert’s on early efforts of Maupassant; or Chippendale’s on journey-work of his apprentices—these would be inestimable value to all soldiers, authors, or carpenters.

Yours faithfully,

G. M. Ford, Capt.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Mr. Frank Swinnerton mentions, I think impiety, the case of Mr. Compton Mackenzie as an instance of his contention that reviewers are prone to praise unduly the work of unknown novelists, and to chide too gently that of authors who have achieved popular success. Surely the function of a critic is to judge a book by its artistic merit, regardless of its author’s popularity or otherwise.

The point of regret about “The Vanity Girl” is that so distinguished a writer should so misuse his talents as to write a type of novel which could have been almost as well done by a dozen lesser novelists. The amazing beauty of “The Passionate Elopement,” “Carnival” and “Guy and Pauline,” the romantic realism of “Sinister Street,” and the colour and fertility of invention displayed in “Sylvia Scarlett,” stamped Mr. Mackenzie as insubstantially the foremost Georgian novelist. It is surely therefore a matter for regret that he should in his latest book have neglected his gift of blending poetry in his prose for his less admirable facility for describing the somewhat uninteresting pleasures and vicissitudes of the aristocracy.

The critic who designated “The Vanity Girl” as “an inglorious success” said in those three words really everything vital that could be said on the subject.

Yours, etc.

May 24, 1920.

JULIAN D’ALBIE.

MR. MACKENZIE’S TREAT

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I venture to doubt whether your reviewer’s condemnation of “The Vanity Girl” as a “pot-boiler” and a betrayal of his art (Athenæum, May 14, p. 639) is justified, and to suggest that it may be the most subtle work that he has yet produced—the picture of a girl of a very ordinary middle-class family who, perhaps by reason of a remote touch of “blue” blood, comes to subordinate all else to making herself the instrument by which a great family is to be perpetuated and its possessions handed on unimpaired. If I am right in my opinion, great art is displayed in showing the extremes of callousness to relations and friends, amounting sometimes to cruelty, and the perverted self-sacrifice of which this slowly idealized ideal, if such it can be called, makes Dorothy Lonsdale capable.

Yours obediently,

S. GASELEE.

Carlton Club, Pall Mall, S.W.1.
May 19, 1920.

[Our reviewer writes: "I would I could agree with Mr. Gaselee that in 'The Vanity Girl' we have a most subtle work—that great art is displayed in showing us the portrait of a silly young person who, gradually, dreams dreams, hears voices, folds her hands in solemn sacrifice, while she cries: 'All for Enguerrand and the world well lost.' But what proof is there? Her cruelty to her family and friends began long before she ever set eyes on Lord Cherhaven. As to that remote strain of 'blue' blood, we do not believe there is a family in West Kensington without it. And what is the self-sacrifice to which he refers? We cannot find it; we believe she loved every moment of it. That Mr. Mackenzie is holding up one division of his public for the other to laugh at; that he is taking his sophisticated public to see the funny little animals feed, is highly possible. But it is a dangerous proceeding, and we do not withdraw the word ‘betrayal.’ —K. M."]

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I am glad to see that a correspondent, who, if I remember rightly, is one of our newer poets, has taken M. B. to task, and I think Mr. Mégroz’s reference to Kant’s clear definition of aesthetic perception is unanswerable philosophically. But I could wish that he had dealt more fully with the influence of music, especially Beethoven’s. Whether mastery implies or whether art is not so vital a question as whether Beethoven’s music reveals “the subjectivity of lyricism” or a Shakespearian power of objectifying experience.

Personally, I consider Beethoven to be both lyrical (subjective) and a master of his medium of expression. And if Beethoven’s music, especially the Symphonies, be truly subjective and lyrical, I should be inclined to regard lyricism as the supreme quality in art, which can produce in us “aesthetic exaltation.” This is because, fundamentally, the human race is a unity, and a great lyrical, subjective utterance by an artist finds its echoes in each perceptual individual. Deep responds to deep.

Faithfully yours,

ERNST H. CONNELL.

Ib, Palmerston Road, Edinburgh.
May 24, 1920.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I should like to ask Mr. Mégroz if any music can be great music that has not an uplifting moral effect upon an audience. If as I think, and as Aristotle said, moral significance is an inseparable attribute of Art, the greatest Art must be significant of goodness as well as beauty. Hence the influence of great music is always good ethically, and so there is no reason why aesthetic appreciation should not at least be guided by the moral sense. Possibly, as Plato maintained, beauty itself implies goodness; in which case Mr. Mégroz and Kant must do quite well.

Yours faithfully,

PETER PAN IN PARIS

AU TEMPS DE JUDAS : SOUVENIRS DES MILIEUX POLITIQUES, LITTÉRAIRES, ARTISTIQUES ET MÉDICAUX, DE 1890 À 1908.
Cinquième Série. Par Léon Daudet. (Paris, Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. 6fr. 80.)

"Eh quoi, sîôt après la grande guerre, allez-vous rouvrir l'ère des discordes civiles?" This is the question which M. Daudet fears will be provoked by the title of the fifth volume of his memoirs. As a matter of fact, the title is the only provocative thing about the book. If there are still fires in the ashes of the Dreyfus Affair, M. Daudet has taken care not to stir them up. Having added since those days the scalps of a Minister of the Interior and an ex-Prime Minister to his trophies, he can well afford to be magnanimous. He insists, it is true, that both Dreyfus at his degradation and Malvy at his trial showed the same "couleur traitre," which is (secret service detectives, please note!) "d'une nuance intermédiaire entre le blanc et le terreux"; and he draws up a damning table of dates, which proves, for the benefit of those who had not observed the fact, that France was invaded by the Germans only twenty years after the outbreak of the Affaire, but he is content thus simply to hint at the strength of his case. It would, indeed, be wrong not to scrutinize that table too closely. It would be palpably unfair to inquire, for instance, whether "1894, Arrestation d'Alfred Dreyfus," or "1899, Dreyfus gracié," is meant as the black-letter date that precipitated the disaster. We will allow M. Daudet to be enigmatic, as enigmatic as that kindly old Dreyfusard lady who went about (he tells us) murmuring, "Ah! comme notre pauvre Alfred est innocent, mon Dieu, mon Dieu, quel malheur!" In fact, we will try to outdo him in generosity. Since M. Daudet forgives M. Reinach the lead he took in the Affaire, we will try to forgive him the seven-volume history he wrote of it. Of these crimes, the latter was the heavier.

The present instalment of M. Daudet's reminiscences suggests, like its predecessors, though perhaps more mildly, that his pugnacity, his irreverence, his craze for lampooning, must have made him in his lifetime a source of great annoyance to a large circle of refined people. His biography is unmistakably the biography of a popular man. The number of houses he has visited (and continued to visit in spite of his indiscretions) is evidence of that. He has probably been pardoned everything in consideration of his wonderful innocence. He is (if he will excuse the comparison) more innocent than Dreyfus himself, and there is no need in his case to add "Quel malheur!" He has put nothing so funny into this book as his grave discovery that "Le service militaire, avec ses injustices qu'il entraîne, est un ferment d'antimilitarisme," except, perhaps, his repeated expressions of wonder at the timorousness of the generals of the Third Republic in face of the civil power. It is useless, it seems, to remind them of Brachet's mot that not Austerlitz, but Brumaire, constitutes the grandeur of Napoleon. They stop their ears relentlessly. "Que cela est étrange!"

We must not, however, assume that M. Daudet is the man to credit just any old superstition. He knows now that the Freemasons do not assassinate their enemies. He knows it because he has been at the throats of both Malvy and Caillaux—and behold he still lives! He knows, too, that Léo Taxil was a fraud, and the charming Miss Diana Vaughan a myth. "Que de bonnes dames dupées, juste ciel! Que de vieux généraux fourrés dedans! Quel saccage de canards!" He remains convinced, nevertheless, that "en politique on n'a jamais trop d'imagination." That is a singularly dangerous axiom—for him, for the good ladies and the old generals.

Yet none of his readers could bear the thought of a changed M. Daudet, a Daudet grown-up. He must for ever patrol Paris with his own incommunicable mixture of candour and malice, and set down for our delight all that he has observed, exactly as he observed it. He has the gift, which distinguishes the great from the mediocre cartoonist, of verisimilitude in caricature. It is Zola himself, we are persuaded, who passes jauntily by in these pages, promising to redeem his bad books by a religious romance, "'chafte' et même 'myтиque, mon bon.'" In the stupefied salon of Madame de Loynes, when the news is brought of Syveton's assault on the Minister of War in the Chamber, we hear the uprising (we cannot doubt it) of the very voice of Ernest Judet: "Bsurde, bsurde, toudiskaphzimplizikite." These things are as authentic as snapshots taken during a battle, and the book is full of them—full, too, of sublime designations such as "Boule de Jui," applied to a prominent Dreyfusard, or "Saint Thomas Taquin," a title for that tortuous apologist Brunetière. And the anecdotes? Here is the author himself, at an evening party of Hebrews, confiding to an important guest that he is "un agent en bourgeois, chargé de surveiller les colliers de perles"; and here is the German Prison Camp Commandant, demanding of a French officer, convicted by court-martial of circulating French newspapers and books among his fellow-captives, the name of the commune where he was born in order that the sentence may be communicated to the Mayor: "Pourquoi cela?" demanda Cuignet—"Afin, mossié le commandant, que votre contamination l'étouffante soit bortée zur fureur canier chatafée."

In the last chapters of the book, devoted to the fate of Gabriel Syveton, we see the author under a different aspect. The grim tale of the last days and the mysterious death of this strange personage, the centre of so many shattered Nationalist hopes, is told with extraordinary power and realism. The scene of the finding of Syveton's body sends us back in thought to the death of Mon pavon in "Le Nabab." Something, at any rate, of the father's talent has descended on the son. "Le jour où la France reviendra au régime normal et indispensable à son relèvement, qui est le monarchique héréditaire,"—on that day, no doubt, many fine things will happen. For ourselves, we should hail it with considerable satisfaction if it set M. Daudet free to write novels in earnest.

A MEDIOCRE NOVEL

JOSEPH SOLVASTER: EIN ROMAN. Von Henri Gullbeaux. Aus dem französischen Manuskript übersetzt von Hermynia von zur Mühlen. (Dresden; Rudolf Kaemmerer.)

This book might be classed as a more or less disguised autobiographical novel, or taken to be mainly an inventive directed against modern Parisian artistic and literary tendencies and personalities. From either point of view, the book achieves no more than a rather fresh and vigorous mediocrity. Time-worn ideas and sentiments are presented as novelties; the stale tricks of naturalism and impressionism are performed with the clumsy fervour of the amateur conjurer; the self-importance, if slightly annoying, is another defect of immaturity. But the bitterness, the contempt for his fellows, the morbid (or, as Joseph Solvaster would say, sensitive) pleasure to scrutinize that tender mem of the Dreyfus affair, is undoubtedly a great and shabby aspect, cannot be altogether excused on the same grounds. For one who advocates a broad cosmopolitan attitude towards humanity, Joseph Solvaster is singularly intolerant of his immediate neighbours. The kind of exclusiveness and ill-humour which he shows in judging them is, with his excessively supple self-esteem, precisely the mood of chauvinism applied to personal instead of international relations. No good reason appears why this novel should not have been suffered to remain in its French manuscript form.

F. W. S.
THE APACHE

L’ÉQUIPE. Par Francis Carco. (Paris, Emile-Paul Frères. 5fr.)

THE Apache of Paris has a curious fascination that Bill Sikes can never possess. Even when he is a dissipated little rat of sixteen, polishing a house-front with his puny shoulder-blades, he contrives somehow or other to strike a picturesque attitude. Equally as M. Carco clearly commands, but we did know a grizzled "flic," a Corsican with bristling moustaches, who had descended alone into a cellar where nine of these youths were discussing their wine with the ladies of their kind, and brought up from it two who were "wanted" for murder. As many rats would have done better against a bagful of ferrets.

That is the chief fault we have to find with this curious and troubling history. Marcel Bouve, the captain of the Équipe, is too obviously the author’s "hero." Without saying as much in so many words, he seems, perhaps half-consciously, to desire that we should see in him something other than the scoundrel and assassin which he is. We feel the weight of the indignation of Coleridge when he went to see "Bertram," or, the Castle of St. Aldobrand," at Drury Lane, at being called upon to admire Marcel Bouve.

For the rest, M. Carco has handled with great skill an incident that recalls the theme of "Crime and Punishment." Bouve, liberated from prison, finds that his band has been in his absence seduced by a stranger, a Marseillais, and has deserted his standard. There follows a long and varying struggle between the two, at the end of which he knifes the intruder to death. But the mother of Boboche, the dead man, has guessed that he is his slayer. She owes him no particular ill-will; she is too much of the world of bandits for that; but she has a fierce and morbid desire to know how her son came by his end and how Bouve has disposed of the body. The man is haunted by her, mastered by dread that she may betray him, mingled with a strange sympathy for this wretched old woman he detests. His resolution is broken, he dares attempt nothing. For long he is on the point of murdering her, but cannot summon up the necessary courage. Then at last he goes to her, tells her in fullest detail of the duel—and lifts the weight from his shoulders. He celebrates his recovery by a burglary that same night.

The story is dated by one of those torchlight processions that were inaugurated by M. Millerand when Minister for War, which is described with bitter sarcasm by M. Carco. The captain, in company with a young disciple, returns to his lodging, thinking of the possibilities of a war.

Il prit conçu de Bouve, qui gravit les escaliers de son hôtel, et il imagina, tout en pensant à son pèlerin:

—La guerre, alors... non, quelle horreur! Ah! si y avait la guerre.

Et il conclut:

—Il m’aurait paix. But doublez... ils l’avaient!... et doublez he was fashioned into very serviceable cannon-loder of a much-decorated victor.

LETTERS FROM ITALY

X. HISTORICAL MATERIALISM

ORIANI could not reconstitute his environment all in a moment at a time when Positivist theory had not yet completed its curve. A forcible introduction of an intuitive system which was altogether new had not the smallest chance of success. On the contrary, it was essential that Positivism should mature amid an environment of its own mental premises. A true historical consciousness only attain maturity as the result of the critical condition of philosophical methods devoid of thought and of a sociology of Positivism, due to the spiritual claims of the immediate data of historical experience, the economic facts. The so-called materialist school of economists, which sees in the economic aspect an immanent criterion of the interpretation of the data, has played a part not unlike that of the empiricist and intuitionist schools in the renewal of our philosophic culture. In its eyes economics are not a coarse materialism denying all spiritual independence. They appear as an elementary and primary form of psychic life, strong enough to impress its own character on all the other forms. And the orthodox Marxian theory contains a strongly rationalistic interpretation of the social significance of the social struggle. As a historiographic canon Marxism has breathed new life into modern historical writing by delivering it from the influence of literature and opening its eyes to the reality of the most vital interests of contemporary society.

Oriani owes his theory of historical realism to Antonio Labriola. Though lacking in depth and real speculative ability, he is a lively, acute writer, who has succeeded in giving Marxism an individual note. While in Germany it was degenerating into an empty dualistic ideology, he transformed it into a historical doctrine with strictly monistic tendencies. "History," he tells us, ("Saggio intorno alla concezione materialistica della storia") (1895), "does not rest on the difference between truth and falsehood, or between the just and the unjust, still less on the more abstract antithesis between the possible and the real—as if the facts stood on one side, while on the other side their own shadows and phantasms were ranged against them as ideas." It is invariably all of a piece, and rests entirely on the process of the formation and transformation of society. This must be understood in an entirely objective sense, altogether independent of our likes and dislikes." Yet Labriola’s objective outlook, which recalls the teaching of Vico and Engels, does not refuse to recognize the human values in history, but only the purely human judgment. Hence he cannot lose his faith in the social progress, even in the most artificial background, man has produced himself; and in this lies the real kernel, the concrete reason, the actual foundation of all that, by various fantastic combinations and logical syllogisms, has given rise to the certain truth of the idea of the progress of the human spirit." This is downright idealism; and for this very reason Labriola should be less than ever inclined to insist on the distinction between the economic structure and the political and social superstructure of society, as is shown also by the acuteness of his criticism of the doctrine of the factors of history. Hence the same objective and monistic doctrines of Marx do not seem quite at home in his philosophical history, and he often succeeds in producing a simple travesty of Hegelian ideas. Thus he asserts that, for historical materialism, the process of becoming, or evolution, is real, is, in fact, reality itself, just as work is real, since through it man produces himself and is always in the immediate character of animal existence to perfect freedom, which is communism. And again, there is no such thing as an unknowable, or at least there is no knowable limit, because, in the immanent process of work, which is experience, men know everything that they need and that it is necessary to know. But apart from these, the substance of Labriola’s work lies in the fact that, by deepening the concept of history, it contains the implied refutation of historical materialism. Once you deny all dualism, every theory of the factors of history, and every interpretation that supposes human development, all reason for separating economics from the social superstructures and making economics the foundation of these disparities in history. Taken thus in its most concrete form, and without that combination of history and nature that gives it a characteristic significance in the work of Marx and Engels, there can be no justification for historical materialism as a philosophy of history.

And in his review of Labriola's work Croce laid stress upon this liquidation of historical materialism as a philosophy. For Croce it remained a simple canon of historiography, or, better, a sum of new data, of new experiences that enter into the conscience of the historian. All the ups and downs of historical materialism, from Labriola to Loria (who is, however, more daring and fantastic in his constructive work), Cicotti, Salvenini and Volpe, have a realistic tone, a sense of the concreteness of historical intuition, which are a complete contrast to the abstract tendencies of the sociologists and the mistrustful pedantry of the philosophers. Salvenini and Volpe are the best representatives of a more modern school, the so-called economic-juridical school, which is distinct from the materialists and is more successful in satisfying the inherent needs that form the premises of its philosophy.

The field in which the investigations of the new tendencies most readily meet is the life of the communes, studied in its origins, as Volpe remarks, to the interest of the research is very different from that which inspired the investigators of the nineteenth century, who saw in the ancient municipalities the foundations of the Italian commune. Their theories are valuable for the history of their century and are precious documents for the bourgeois nationalists, who were then struggling to render their own country what it once was for a people, a country and animate it with the breath of memories. (Volpe, "Questions Fondamentali sull'Origine e Svolgimento dei Comuni Italiani," Pisa, 1904.) Today, on the contrary, we see in the commune the first stirrings of the renewal of economic life that is paving the way for the Renaissance and the modern world; and instead of seeing in the struggle between Guelphs and Ghibelines a military episode in the age-long struggle between the Empire and the Papacy, we endeavor to bring out the real interests involved in the conflict. For Volpe the history of the communes is the history of the progressive differentiation of the preexistent communal embryo, a differentiation which is both the co-ordination and the combination of the individual units which foreshadow Italian unity. The conception is, of course, abstract, since it has not yet become profound feeling, and is therefore so much the less capable of determining a political action, but it none the less foreshadows a "Studi sull'Origine e Svolgimento dei Comuni Italiani," Pisa, 1902.) As contrasted with feudal individualism, the age of the commune, an age of social progress, of close organization, of continued alliances between city and city, begins to give us in Humanism "the man," who is of value in and for himself, both in philosophic theory and practice of man as consciousness and as a builder of History, who is both subject and object of the culture of the Renaissance.

Among Italian historians Volpe is the most highly endowed with philosophic ability, the first to break away from the bad tradition of mental degradation of recent times, when historians make a display of their ignorance of or their contempt for philosophy. The loss is all their own. At present the student of modern education is surprised by a consciousness that serious historical culture cannot dispense with a serious philosophic preparation, and that the elements of Vico's synthesis of philosophy and philology cannot be kept apart except at the risk of mutual sterilization. Mindful of their highest traditions, historians are naturally the first to recognize the necessity of forming their minds upon a philosophic basis. Nor do these requirements affect them alone. The same tendency is seen among workers in every field in which the subject possesses a profoundly historical foundation and comes into contact with the facts only in so far as it comes into contact with the historical mind that possesses and realizes them. The philosophic education now required of every scholar is not one which, in accordance with Positivist principles, endeavors to bring together the latest results of the different sciences, but on the contrary one which applies itself earnestly to the environment of every science, penetrating the object of research with thought, and overcoming its passive resistance in the transfiguring light of consciousness.

We observed on an earlier occasion how these requirements are gradually making themselves felt in particular subjects; but there is an opposite tendency which contrasts with it and originates in the sociological movement that still flourishes. The social sciences, which those would lend themselves most readily to a historical-philosophical treatment—if for no other reason, because thought applied to them earlier than to the natural sciences the great principle that man knows what is happening in order to act upon it—individualistic and Positivist state. Without lingering over the lesser writers, I propose to mention the most prominent and recent leader of the school, Vilfredo Pareto, who is generally regarded in Italy as a great master. I have read his "Trattato di Sociologia Generale" (Florence, 1916) with a feeling of genuine regret at seeing how a writer of such vast and constructive learning, such keen political and social insight, so different from the gratifying scientific austerity, has managed to reduce his eminent qualities to impotence in a work constructed on abstract and mechanical principles. The "Philosophophobia" which appears in every line and almost develops into persecution mania, the wrong-headed conviction that human actions can be cut into slices and catalogued like so much merchandise, the blind belief in the possibility of applying mathematical principles in every conceivable way, are responsible for Pareto's sociology.

The author's attitude is very like that of the critics of science (Poincaré, Mach, etc.), who shrink from any research into essentials and regard the scientific process as a complex of useful fictions. Pareto goes even further. "Let us examine the uniformities that are presented by the facts," he says, "uniformities to which we give the name of laws. But instead of the facts being governed by the laws, the laws are governed by the facts." This is the usual prejudice of formal logic, which treats thought as worthless at the very moment when it is proposing to examine it, placing the laws lower than the chaotic mass of the facts. And Pareto, certainly not to his credit, gives us an enlarged and far more systematic form of this prejudice when he heaps up a vast mass of instances and emptying them in so-called laws and unimportant uniformities that represent the residue of a dead abstraction. He begins with a general division of actions into logical actions, "which unite the actions logically to the end, not merely with regard to the subject which the actions complete, but also with regard to those which have wider cognitions," and illogical actions, in which the connection is only imaginary, having no objective value. Then, based on this impalpable distinction, follow synoptic and graphical pictures, complicated with sub-classes and sub-sub-classes, with hosts of examples through hundreds of pages. A further classification, which is worked out in the second volume, distinguishing, in accordance with the actions, theories and opinions in the residuums, which include feelings and instincts less subject to variation, and "derivatives," which represent logical elaborations, explanations of and deductions from primal elements. I shall not spend long over this Lullian art. I shall merely say that the system which Pareto seeks to build up upon these clumsy formulae is a general theory of social equality based upon the properties of the "residuums" and the "derivatives." And the ultimate result, which could have been achieved even without this monstrous mathematical machinery of classification, is the principle of the circulation of the dites, of the successive appearances of aristocracy in history.

I do not mean to say that all Pareto's work is a collection of futilities of this kind. It teems with historical references that make it interesting in spite of the abstractions and the failure to put the facts in context and connected, like that awakened by a weekly review or a daily paper, to the modern idea of the "Larousse" type. Historical learning which is not inspired by a central idea giving it life, which has no genuinely historical outlook, but brings facts together in the strongest confusion, can possess no scientific value. But in Pareto we may well find the typical inspiration of the "futurae opusistorum," in the balance with which he passes natural science through the most abstract mathematical journalism to the most detailed historical detail. Both characteristics originate in the same inability to take up a central position and maintain a concrete grasp upon the data of thought.

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the subject-class being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

200 RELIGION.

"The Hebrew Word," says Mr. Zangwill, "alone was made flesh"; and in this identification of a divine mediating influence with a historical character Professor MacKintosh sees one striking instance of originality. He enumerates also the principle of an atonement initiated not from beneath, but from above, the active characteristic of Christianity, and the dignity which it has conferred on manual labour. (In Indian, Greek, and Roman philosophies, intellectual activity alone was considered worthy of an enlightened disciple.) There are some interesting remarks upon those syncretistic religions which became fashionable over the Roman Empire about a century after our era.

Gantt (H. L.). ORGANIZING FOR WORK. Allen & Unwin, 1920. 7 1/2 in. 121 pp. charts, index, 5/6 n. 331.1

The American writer proposes to counter the schemes of Socialism, Communism, and Bolshevism by reforming the industrial and business system, and, without any revolutionary change, making it once again serve the community as its primary aim. Admitting that through the concentration of interest on profits it has made the community subservient to itself, the author emphasizes the active power of evil, and as great a menace to peace, as was the autocratic power of the Kaiser—he neverthelesss argues that the system is sound at its basis, and, as American experience taught during the war, can be directed to useful ends. Mr. Gantt expounds scientific methods of management that he claims, bring out the maximum of productivity, and illustrates their efficiency and fairness, and how the full control can be obtained, by a series of diagrammatic charts.

Martin (Joseph). A GEOGRAPHY OF ASIA ("Macmillan's Practical Modern Geographies"). Macmillan, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 314 pp. ill. maps, indexes, 5/6 n. 572.89

The author emphasizes those aspects of the regions which bear directly upon the lives and activities of the people. The lessons consist of statistical exercises and map-reading, followed by descriptions of the countries, with suitable questionnaires. There are many reasons why the coming generation should be well informed about Asia, and Mr. Martin’s book will be decidedly helpful to schoolmasters and their pupils.

*Reed (Thomas Harrison). FORM AND FUNCTIONS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT. Hartrop, 1919. 8 in. 567 pp. ill. apps. index, 10/6 n. 353

Intended primarily for High School pupils, this book luminously deals with the background of American government; with parties and elections, State constitutions, local governments, the Congress of the United States, Civil Service, territories and dependencies; the functions of government, such as national defence and education; and numerous other topics.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

*East (Edward M.) and Jones (Donald F.). INBREEDING AND OUTBREEDING: THEIR GENETIC AND SOCIOLOGICAL SIGNIFICANCE ("Monographs on Experimental Biology"). Lippincott [1919]. 8 in. 285 pp. ill. bibl. index, 10/6 n. 575.1 See review, p. 706.

700 FINE ARTS.

*Valence (Aymer). OLD CROSSES AND LYCHGATES. Batsford, 1920. 10 in. 216 pp. pl. ill. bibl. index, 18/ n. 723.51

It is affirmed that the illustrations in this fine monograph form the most complete collection of types of crosses and lychgates ever brought together in a single volume. Mr. Valence has grouped his subjects comparatively, so as to show the evolution of the shafts on steps, the Eleanor crosses, the preaching and other types, and finally the market cross, from the rude monolithic form. Few old lychgates remain, and these are described with knowledge.

Thomas (Walter). BEOWULF ET LES PREMIERS FRAGMENTS ENQUES ANGO-SAXONS: étude critique et traduction. Paris, Didier, 1919. 10 in. 125 pp. paper, 2r. 50. 829.3

Like most French works on Anglo-Saxon and Middle English, this study and rendering of "Beowulf" etc. is of little interest to scholars and is unsatisfactory as a school-book. The best that can be said of it (and it is not much) is that it is a great improvement on H. Perring’s "Poèmes Anglo-Saxon de Beowulf" published in 1912.

POETRY.

Bartlett (Vernon). SONGS OF THE WINDS AND SEAS. Elkin Mathews, 1920. 7 in. 58 pp. 3/6 n. 821.9

"God made the country, but man made the town"—Mr. Bartlett has rediscovered the old truth, and restates it with an obvious sincerity. In his expression of it he is somewhat hampered by that vague "poetical" tradition which is a degenerate combination of many old poetical styles, corresponding to the Academy style in painting.

Dante.

Grandgent (Charles Hall). THE POWER OF DANTE. Harrap [1920]. 8 in. 254 pp. 7.6 n. 851.15

We have no doubt that these lectures, which were delivered at the Lowell Institute, served in the first instance an excellent purpose. Whether it was necessary by their publication to increase the already enormous literature of the subject may be another question. In Professor Grandgent's justification we must say that he gives his readers not only much writing about Dante, but also much of Dante's writing, though sometimes through the necessarily distorting medium of a verse translation. In accordance with a fashion initiated, we imagine, by Carlyle, he idealizes his hero, representing as an effect of righteous indignation those traces of cruelty and vindictiveness which ordinary minds attribute to the influence of an age one or two degrees worse than our own.

Mr. Golland grinds the anapastic barrel-organ of humorous verse with vigour and occasional skill. "The Grit," "Let Us Forget," and some of the "Commentaries on the Classics" are among the pieces that come off.

See review, p. 700.

*Jack (Adolphus Alfred). A Commentary on the Poetry of Chaucer and Spenser. Glasgow, MacLehose & Jackson, 1920. 8 in. 381 pp. app. index, 8/6 n. 821.17 and .31

See review, p. 698.

*Masefield (John). Enslaved; and other poems. Heinemann, 1920. 7½ in. 125 pp., 6/ n. 821.9

The poem which gives Mr. Masefield's latest volume its title is a kind of Henty narrative of capture and escape, full of thrills and heart-breakings. "The Hounds of Hell" and "Cap on Head" are long ballads of supernatural happenings. The book concludes with a number of sonnets, in which Mr. Masefield displays himself at his best.

Mr. Eden Phillipotts' poetry demands respect for its seriousness and its high accomplishment. Of some of his pieces one has the impression that they were written in an exercise in verse. "Noon," "June," "Night," "Wind of the West"—for the writing of these Mr. Phillipotts seems to have had no compelling reason. But in others a genuine inspiration is apparent. "The Neolith," "and "Tiger" contain fine things.

Smith-Dampier (E. M.), tr. Danish Ballads. Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 7½ in. 167 pp. boards, 6/6 n. 839.81

Miss Smith-Dampier has made a straightforward rhymed translation of some thirty Danish ballads, prefacing them wherever necessary with a short historical explanation. It is interesting to find among the ballads of magic the original of Matthew Arnold's "Forsaken Merman." The old ballad ends on a curiously grotesque note. "Oh, think of the big ones, and think of the small," implores the Merman ("The cows have flown, the little mice mouse, in Arnold's poem): "Of the baby in the cradle think thou most of all." The moral wise replies:

I think not of the big ones, I think not of the small,
Of the baby in the cradle I'll think least of all!
Ha, ha, ha!

Of the baby in the cradle I'll think least of all!

FICTION.

Apparent author of this novel, which is largely concerned with racing, betting, "booksies," and the like, has endeavoured to assume the mantle of Nat Gould. Apart from love, "the turf" is the main interest in life of the principal characters. A homely heroine, who attempts suicide because of her lover's supposed detection, a greedy, vampirish woman, a shady tipster, and a very unheroic hero are of the set filling the foreground of Mr. Applin's story.

Aumonier (Stacy). One After Another. Hutchinson [1920]. 7½ in. 280 pp., 7/6 n.

See review, p. 702.

Brand (Max). Trailin'! Putnam, 1920. 7½ in. 375 pp., 7/6 n. 813.5

A good tale of the Far West, whither Anthony Bard, an educated Easterner, of Western parentage, journeys in search of the man he supposes to have murdered his father. Savage buck-jumping horses are greatly to the fore, and the hero's feats upon some of these animals, as well as his exploits with firearms, require an effort of faith on the part of the reader. But Anthony, though he "looks like a tenderfoot" and "sounds like a tenderfoot," "ain't a tenderfoot"—to quote the text. Anthony discovers his man, finds a wife, and has a great surprise. The story undeniably grips.

See review, p. 715.

See notice, p. 714.

The heroine, Beryl Tennyson, is a "mouse," that is to say, a suffragette who has been released from prison under the "cat-and-mouse" Act. Arnold Sinclair, her lover, has been trained and educated by his strait-laced mother to the main end that he should not resemble his sport-loving, "normal" father. The two women are temperamentally antagonistic, but agree in their hatred of war. Armageddon comes, and the heroine makes the only sacrifice, and the book has its points, but as a whole it somehow misses fire.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

*Hanson (T. W.). The Story of Old Halifax. Halifax, F. King & Sons, 1920. 8 in. 286 pp. ill. maps, index, 914.294

History—at any rate the teaching of history—should begin at home, and Mr. Hanson, long known as an historical and literary student of Halifax and the neighbourhood, is one of a growing band who have chronicled the annals and the social development of their towns with an eye to the boys and girls who live there. The book loses nothing in interest for older people through this primary aim; it is a sound piece of work that should be in every good general library. Most of the photographic illustrations, by Mr. H. P. Kendall, are first-rate, and the drawings and panoramic sketches are clear and appropriate. The Borough Librarian, Mr. Green, has contributed a good index. Unfortunately, the publishers have overlooked the serious objections to employing the two principal maps as end-papers.

This is the record of a summer tour, made while yet the war raged, among our National Trust possessions in the West of England. To many readers the very existence of the National Trust for acquiring and protecting "places of historic interest and natural beauty," will come as a pleasing revelation, and lend additional charm to Canon Rawnsley's glowing descriptions. The localities visited include Barmouth, Tintagel, Nether Stowey and many others, and we learn with pleasure of the genuine "restoration" of buildings and landscape, resulting from the activity of the National Trust. The illustrations, like the letterpresses, are agreeable.

Ligne (Charles Joseph, Prince de).

The first instalment of a selection from the intimate and voluminous correspondence (preserved in the University of Ghent) of the famous soldier and writer, Charles Joseph, Prince de Ligne. The correspondence is of interest and importance from the light which it throws on the manners and customs of the time, and on the economic and political history of the Low Countries of France during the period covered by the letters. Those included in the present series range from 1771 to 1787.

Mitford (Mary Russell).

*Hill (Constance), Mary Russell Mitford and Her Surroundings. Lane, 1920. 9 in. 403 pp. il. pors. index, 21/11.

This is a collection of letters written by a hard-working and chaste at the Y.M.C.A. hostel in France from 1915, who was killed at Etaples during an enemy air-raid in May, 1918. Written when she was between seventeen and twenty-one, the letters are full of everyday details. They are revelations of hospital life, an air-raid, and the sound and flash of gunfire on the far horizon. Taken altogether, they make a beautiful record, whose beauty comes wholly from simplicity and homeliness. The writer is too busy, too zestful to be troubled in spirit. As a revelation of courage, endurance of cold, hunger and cold, the record is inspiring and something supremely touching in the revelations we have had of late of young and sheltered girls who for an ideal have endured so sweetly and unconcernedly the burdens that call on the full strength of character. They are all the more poignant for that sweetness and unconcern.

930-990 HISTORY.

Most people will, we think, be surprised to learn that in the early days of the Dutch East India Company the Cape population received a considerable reinforcement from French Protestant refugees. A few much-distorted place and family names are the only linguistic traces which remain of this immigrant. It seems needless, indeed, that use of the church or school was, after the first years, governmentally forbidden. The settlers were chosen with a view to their skill in distilling vinegar and brandy, and also in vine and olive culture, and Mr. Botha thinks that they contributed in no small measure to the prosperity of the colony.

This manual is written from the American point of view, and contains a good deal of useful information, conveyed chiefly in the unattractive guise of statistics. Those who remember the struggle over our own Health Insurance Act will be interested to learn that a somewhat similar measure (since passed in a modified form) was defeated by Referendum in 1900, mainly through the opposition of the voluntary societies. Woman suffrage has so far made little progress in Switzerland. In one canton (Vaud) women are, however, permitted to help choose parish councillors and pastors, but "not made eligible to these offices." This placing in juxtaposition of two somewhat distinct functions is perhaps due to transatlantic dry humour; but it is not amiss to remember that Miss Maude Royden has been invited to preach in the Cathedral at Geneva on the occasion of the approach of Geneva. The illustrations supply a note of romance which is not conspicuous in the text.

POEMS FROM BEYOND

Any Bookseller :: Any Library.

This book contains the substance of lectures delivered to students of economics at Cambridge in 1919 and the subjects dealt with include:

The author shows in these lectures that Pepys, familiar to the last generation in the sphere of literature, was also a leading figure in an entirely different world, who rendered inestimable services to naval administration. D. Tanner claims for this great public servant that, despite the peculiar difficulties under which he worked, he did more than anyone else to apply business principles to naval administration.

The aim of this book, which is the first volume in the Cambridge Studies in Medieval Life and Thought, edited by Mr. G. G. Coulton, is to put before the history of English biblical translations into its European background, and to consider English medieval translations historically from a new material.

This essay in evolutionary aesthetics contains a short discussion of the effects on our minds of the aesthetic quality of works of art in the expression of personal relationships. Previous books by the same author are: Evolution and the Need of Atomism (second edition $5 net); Evolution and Natural Life (2s 6d net); Evolution and the Doctrine of the Trinity (2s net).

This book presents a variety of extracts good in themselves and interesting for the subject matter, it has been the particular aim of the present selection to illustrate the history of France by a record of some of her famous sons.

Danish Ballads. Translated by E. M. Smith-Dampier. Crown 8vo. 6s 6d net.

The Danish Ballads, like all other ballads, deal with love, warfare and witchcraft. In the themes they may, they inform them with their own characteristic spirit—love, chivalry and sonnet of the North. So far as possible, Mr. Smith-Dampier has in this selection reproduced the metre and variations of the original ballads.

"It would certainly be hard to think of any soldier poet who expressed religious faith as sincerely and with so much vivid emotional ability, ... the author is not merely a religious poet, but something rare—an artist of considerable artistic power, ... Mr. De Candole died very young, ... but even in this volume appears a remarkable degree of accomplishment, together with a sincerity equally remarkable."

GIBSON & CO.

Price 6d. Postage 1d.

No. II. of The Westminster Classics consists of a collection of twenty-three of the Poems of Wilfrid Wilson Grasping the special merits of which have been widely recognised by the Press.

The Nation says of them:—"The main thing about these poems is just that they are extraordinary poems; by means of their psychology, no less and no more than by means of their metre, their rhyme, their intellectual form and their concrete imagery, they pierce us with flashing understanding of what war is and means—not merely what it is to these individual pieces of ordinary human nature who are injured by it and who yet dominate it, but, by evident implication what war is in itself, as a greatly multithrif by. It seems to us beyond question that Mr. Wilson's "Relate" is one of the most remarkable results the war has had in literature."

BACHELOR COMFORT

EVERY bachelor who lives in comfort knows the value and economy of gas fires. Gas can be lighted in an instant, turned out in an instant—no coals are needed, no ashes are made, no grates have to be cleaned, and no damage is done to the furniture or books, papers or door through smoke or the visits of the sweep. After a tramp in the rain the cheery warmth of a bright fire while one's coat dries is real comfort—which a gas fire enables a bachelor to secure for himself—at any time of the day or night.

THE POETRY OF LEIGH HUNT

It is perhaps the fault of Leigh Hunt himself that his poetry is largely inaccessible to-day. The eagerness and assurance with which he put forth his early work changed, under such a prolonged and ferocious critical onslaught as few writers have ever sustained, into hesitancy and self-deprecation. "I have done my best," says he in the collected edition of 1832, "to render my verses as little unworthy of re-perusal as correction and omission could make them. I have availed myself of the criticism both of friends and enemies; and have been so willing to construe in my disfavour any doubts which arose in my own mind, that the volume does not contain above a third of the verses I have written." It is unnecessary to discuss these principles; their application, however, may well give rise to suspicion when Hunt in the next paragraph remarks that he has admitted the "Sonnet on the Nile" only at the request of a partial friend. The volume thus ruthlessly whittled down was followed by a pocket edition in 1844, in which there was small change; and just after Hunt's death in 1859 appeared his final selection, which by no means includes even many poems familiar to the anthologists of the nineteenth century. This volume, if not superseded, has been pleasantly supplemented by Mr. R. Brimley Johnson's edition (1891); other half-hearted attempts have been made, but more to Hunt's detriment than otherwise.

A sketch of Hunt's poetical career may not be out of place. Its very opening was inauspicious. A large volume of "Poems, written between the Ages of Twelve and Sixteen," was published in 1801, bought with indecent haste, and a fourth edition called for; while Hunt "was introduced to literati, and shown about among parties." In spite of these temptations, he refrained from printing another book of verse until 1814, when he sowed enmity broadcast by reprinting from the Reflector his untidy and swashbuckling satire "The Feast of the Poets." With this intolerant pasquinade were bound up a few translations from Catullus and others—work of much more value, and not yet surpassed in fidelity of colour and sense. These translations were his main claim to poetical success so far; but the following year he published a really notable volume. It was a masque, "The Descent of Liberty": the scenery bright, aerial, and yet not unearthly; the tale one of enchantment, and the allegory of Napoleon's overthrow delicately shadowed; the verse graceful and gentle:

While the clouds hush off in racks
And in long-leaved golden tracks
Ships to ships on the still sea
Glance with broad sail courteously:
And on land, for countless miles,
Passion rests and Nature smiles,
And not a harsher sound is heard
Than of nest-resuming bird.

With locks, and streams, and village calls
And bells, that winds fling out o'er walls
From joyous towns at intervals.

Hunt prefixed an essay in which he wished no other stage setting for his masque than the reader's sympathy; none the less, he was curiously circumstantial in his directions: "Poetry breaks at once from out the air . . . in a robe of carnation or flesh-colour, scarfed with green, her wings like the bird of Paradise, her head crowned with laurel and surmounted by a lambent fire, and a magic wand in her hand." The lyrics here and there are good, and follow Bacon's rule: Let the songs be loud and cheerful, and not chirpings or pulings. "The Story of Rimini" followed, in 1816. Its unpopularity was so widespread that it went through three editions; and Hunt was accused of practically all the vices, including sexual perversion, on the evidence of the mildly passionate theme, chosen from Dante. The grave error into which he had actually trained himself was flippancy. It is not that he was overfond of his gawky coinages, "scattery light," "clipsome waist," "dings of sunshine" and the rest: indeed, they are not so numerous as to be really troublesome: but he had so far overlooked the dignity of poetry as to be writing lines like these—"May I come in?" said he:—it made her start,—

That smiling voice:—she colour'd, press'd her heart
A moment, as for breath, and then with free
And usual tone said,—"O yes,—certainly!"

On such trivialities the critics might have based the truest anathema: not content, however, with legitimate grist, they ground up the poem wholesale. For it is, taken broadly, a momentous and a genuine poem. Hunt had an instinct for warm lights and shades, and invariably succeeds in his background; he loved the town with the country, and the pageantry of his first canto is full of human interest and poetic radiance. That great heirloom, the English heroic couplet, once more became in his hands a trumpet for "soul-animating strains"; of its most sonorous utterances he was not capable, but he put the parcelled monotone of the preceding century to shame. And it is as certain as may be that the free movements and sensitive cadences, then recaptured, had some share in the making of Shelley and Keats, and later of Swinburne and William Morris.

As yet undismayed by the hornets' nest which he had aroused, Hunt hastened to produce his excellent 1818 volume, namely, "Foliage." A sort of poetic manifesto ushered in the poems, according to his custom; the book was further subdivided by a happy fancy into " Greenwoods," or original verses, and "Evergreens," or translations from the poets of antiquity. Of one of the latter, the "Atys" of Catullus, he says finely that "it comes among the other pieces like a spectre at noonday"; nor has he failed to represent its storm-rhythm and its grimness. The first of the new poems demands ample treatment than can be given here; it is "The Nymphs." Not unlike "Endymion" in its lyrical development, nor unlike "The Plea of the Midsummer Fairies" in its subdived and imaginative description, this poem more than any other of Hunt's longer pieces deserves recognition. It contains, indeed, more "quaintnesses and neologisms" than "Rimini," but more than makes amends by the spiritual certainty and the musical variety which characterize it. There is the fine vision of the passing cloud:

It passed with its slow shadow; and I saw
Where it went down beyond me on a plain,
Sloping its dusky ladders of thick ruin;
And on the mist it made, and blinding awe,
The sun, re-issuing in the opposite sky.
Struck the all-coloured arch of his great eye;
And up, the rest o' the country laughed again:
The leaves were amber: the sunshine
Scored on the ground its conquering line;
And the quick birds, for scorn of the great cloud,
Like children after fear, were merry and loud.

I turned me tow'r'd the west, and felt the air
Thinner and soft and nimble on my face;
The sun was shadow'd by the elms; and made
A little golden ferment in one place,
A strawy fire:—as when within the shade

He used to get of old, and harbour him
Beside a fountain's brim
Who often looking round, came winding there,
Led by the lustre of his beautiful hair.

Surely the simple, the sensuous, the passionate genius is there; nor is the passage unaccompanied, but occurs naturally and without contrast. From mountain-top to deep-sea caves he leads, and everywhere brings to life again the nymphs in all their orders. How gracefully does he trace the home of the Ephydiads!

And O, ye sweet and coy Ephydiads, you,
Why are your names so new
To islands which your liquid lips serene
Keep ever green?

There, there the Ephydiads haunt; there where a gap
Betwixt a heap of tree-tops, hollow and dun,
Shews where the waters run,
And whence the fountain's tongue begins to lap.
There lie they, bullied by little whistling tones
Of rills among the stones,
Or by the rounder murmur, glib and flush,
Of the escaping gush
That laughs and tumbles, like a conscious thing,
For joy of all its future travelling.

The lizard circums in them: and his grave will
The frog, with reckoning leap, enjoys apart,
Till now and then the woodcock frights his heart
With brushing down to dip his dainty bill.

Shelley considered "The Nymphs" to be Hunt's highest achievement, and without any paraphrase urged him to pursue the vein; but it is curious that Hunt should have left the poem to oblivion, and that his editors have been no less apathetic. There was every reason why Hunt should have been producing his best poetry in 1816 and 1817: the war was over; he had been released from gaol; he was surrounded with friends of the finest genius and judgment; and his own age was ripe for work at once original and sound. We find, therefore, in "Foliage" those noble and enduring sonnets, "To His Wife," "The Grasshopper and Cricket," "On a Lock of Milton's Hair," and (greatest of all) "On the Nile":

It flows through old hushed Ægypt and its sands,
Like some grave mighty thought threading a dream...

The less familiar "Power and Gentleness" belongs to this period, in which Hunt gives the lie to his contemporary and his posthumous critics who consider him the poet of suburbanism:

Towers on hills, with foreheads out of sight
In clouds, or shown us by the thunder's light,
Or ghastly prison, that eternally Holds its blind visage out to the lone sea;—

he crowds his sixty lines with grandeur.

With the volume known as "Hero and Leander," produced in 1819, Hunt's most poetical phase appears to have come to an end. The nerve-strain of journalism was becoming too severe for the constant intensities of poetry; the wild and catastrophic Italian enterprise, in which Byron through Shelley persuaded him to join, merely left him ill, dishonoured, and dejected; indeed, it is astonishing that he should have survived as a literary personality at all. Nevertheless, he continued to write poems, and poems of true quality, from time to time, until in 1844 he realized his ambition and saw his work published in a pocket edition. In 1850 the chance of his being chosen Laureate evoked from him a characteristic pean in favour of Tennyson, almost a prophecy: "May he live to wear his laurel to a green old age; singing congratulations to Queen Victoria and human advancement, long after the writer of these lines shall have ceased to hear him with mortal ears."

The collected edition of his Poems issued in 1860, though it by no means gives all of his best, represents his maturity work well enough. The old hatreds had died away, and the recklessness had gone from his verses; there was little left for him to do but take his leisure in trim gardens, and to see the good in things both human and divine. His own verse describes these later poems:

Their very house was fairy: none
Might find it without favour won;
For some great zeal, like errant-knight,
Or want and sorrow's holy right:
And then they reached it by long rounds
Of lanes between thick pastoral grounds
Nest-like, and alleys of old trees,
Until at last, in lawny ease,
Down by a garden and its fountains,
In the ken of mild blue mountains,
Rose, as if exempt from death,
Its many-centuried household breath......
There, walls were books; and the sweet witch,
Painting, had there the rooms made rich
With knights, and dames, and loving eyes
Of heaving-knew kindred, sweet and wise;
Of bishops, gentle as their lawn,
And sirens, whose talk was one May-dawn.
Last, on the roof, a clock's old grace
Look'd forth, like some enchanting face
That never slept, but in the night
Dinted the air with thoughtful might
Of sudden tongue which seem'd to say,
"The stars are firm, and hold their way."

From such a pleasant drowsiness he roused himself
"to show the horrors of war, the false ideas of power produced in the minds of its leaders, and, by inference, the unfitness of those leaders for the government of the world"; no more eloquent prayer for peace had been written by our poets. "Captain Sword and Captain Pen" remains passionate and convincing: so little have the greater singers reckoned with the question of pacifism that until the late war it was a poem almost sui generis.

All gratitude to Leigh Hunt for his swift recognitions of Shelley, of Keats, of Browning and Tennyson; but let it be as gratefully remembered that he too was in Arcadia; that he went through fire and water for the emancipation of poetry; and that he wrote "The Nymphs," "Captain Sword," and the almost supreme sonnet on the Nile.

TO THOMAS HARDY
(On His Birthday.)

To wisdom, truth and beauty dedicate,
With vision clear as cloudless break of day,
You mark man on his immemorial way
Rousing old echoes down the aisles of fate;
Unwarried, yet, the mystery meditate;
Decipher motive, balance and survey;
Reveal the invincible predestinate,
Austerely silent touching "yea" and "nay."
O steadfast master, now your pilgrimage
Lights a new constellation on our sky,
A starry wonder and a heritage
Immortal in its pure humanity:
Through life's frustrated hope and desolate truth
Shall ever shine the beacon of your rapt.

JEHOVAH, BUDDHA AND THE GREEKS

Hellenism. By Norman Bentwich. (Philadelphia, Jewish Publication Society of America.)
Hellenism in Ancient India. By Gauranga Nath Banerjee. (Calcutta and London, Butterworth & Co. 7 rupees 8 annas.)

It is unlikely that Jehovah and Buddha have ever met, too diverse are their habits. Not even their common interest in law approximates them, because to one of them Law means a Table, and to the other it means a Wheel. The utmost we can say is that one they experienced the same event, and that their reactions to it are interesting. The event was the invasion of Alexander the Great. Those who kept the Ten Commandments and those who followed the Eightfold Path became abruptly and simultaneously aware of that energetic young man. His active mind and still more active body hurried over the ancient world, flattening out its prejudices and boundaries before it had time to exclaim, "What's this?" and leaving some considerable hollows into which, after his departure, new influences began to trickle. Three hundred curious years ensued. A little troupe of gods, moderate in size and human in shape, advanced inland and confronted the Asiatic deities, and carried with it such portable hugging as the plays of Euripides and the Socratic method.

The feelings of Jehovah, when the troupe ascended his Holy Hill, are notorious; we may read in Maccabees how he prohibited all gymnastic exercises in Jerusalem, and refused to bind his brows with Bacchicivy. The feelings of Buddha are uncertain; but we may see in the Gandhara sculptures that he has permitted classical motives to engrandelier his legends and to drape his own person, and we may draw our conclusions. Anger on the one side, benign indifference on the other: such apparently were the attitudes of the two living religions of the day when Greece impinged upon them.

To say that Jehovah was angered is, however, to state the situation too simply. The Jewish people were at this time in a complicated position. They were dispersing into the Gentile world, and while the parent stock in Palestine remained orthodox, the Dispersal adopted the Greek speech and dallied with Greek thought. At Alexandria an important Graeco-Judean civilization sprang up, which produced the monumental translation of the Septuagint, the beautiful poem of The Wisdom of Solomon, and the interesting philosophic system of Philo. The Jews who remained in Palestine produced nothing as notable, and partly for this reason posterity has censured them. Mr. Norman Bentwich (he is a prominent Zionist) takes a different view: in his judgment the Jews of Alexandria and elsewhere were entering upon a dangerous path, and the authentic voice of Jehovah continued to peal from Mount Moriah as formerly. He supports his view with learning and moderation, and by two main arguments. In the first place (he says) Greek culture was by now on the decline; it had degenerated into a "confused amalgam with a low moral standard, declining intellectual grasp and vague cosmopolitan professions," and had, therefore, little to offer that was good. And in the second place the temper of the age was opposed to monotheism and to the reasonable worship and contemplation of God; it yearned for redemption, expiation, atonement, éons, emanations, logos; once admitted into the Holy of Holies it played the traitor and opened the doors to a thousand extravagances, and in particular to Christianity. The Palestinian Jews, he would have us note, remained on their guard.

The Rabbi instinctively recognized a canker in this medley. It was not Pharisaic narrowness on their part, but a clear intuition of the essence of Judaism and of the overpowering necessity of preserving its outlook uncontaminated, which led them to set up fences against foreign incursion. They were opposed not to freedom of thought, but to free play for demoralizing influences; and if their attitude was one-sided at the moment, one-sidedness was necessary to sanity.

But who is to decide when an influence is demoralizing? It is at this point that the average Gentile must part company with Mr. Bentwich and must note that beneath his moderate words the weapons of intolerance may lie concealed. One-sidedness always is necessary at the moment; it is always right to say that we have felt it our duty to be unreasonable, as the inquisitions and censorships testify throughout history. The point is important, for Mr. Bentwich's book, though it does not allude to present events in Palestine, has a close bearing on them. It is Zionism at its best, but that best seems not quite good enough for the future peace of the world. One does not wish to see Jehovah re-established on Mount Moriah and gradually subjecting beneath his yoke the Jews of the Dispersal—those very Jews who have done so much for civilization during the last two thousand years. Jehovah would never have allowed Philo to speculate, nor Spinoza, nor Einstein; it would never have been the moment. The Rabbis would instinctively have recognized a canker, as they recognized it in Christ, and have taken action accordingly. In other words Mr. Bentwich is a sound guide who gives a vivid account of the contests and compromises of a fascinating time. His estimate of Hellenistic culture is on the whole just, though he forgets its science: one cannot speak of the "declining intellectual grasp" of an age which measured the earth and invented conic sections. And his account of the Palestinian traditions should be carefully studied, for he has made the subject his own. The upshot is that the Greeks, in their subtle advance against Jehovah, met with general success and one rebuff. They enforced their language and much of their culture upon the Jews of the Dispersal, but recoiled, as did their inheritors the Romans, from the uplands of Palestine.

Now let us see how they fared further East, in the other citadel of religious vitality, in India.

The problem here is more obscure, for there is no literature. The Indian genius, never historical, produced not even a Josephus to record the collision of ideals, and we are thrown back on archaeology. A number of objects have been unearthed, from Afghanistan southward to the Jumna, which show Greek influence and are sometimes Greek in effect. To select from the examples given by Mr. Banerjee: a coin with a nautch girl on the reverse, but a Greek inscription on the obverse; statues of Buddha in Greek costume; representations of Pallas Athene and Great Jupiter. It is clear that the successors of Alexander the Great were playing the same game in the Punjab as in the Levant, and were fostering a Graeco-Buddhist civilization, contemporary with the Graeco-Jewish civilization of Alexandria. Did they encounter a similar opposition? Apparently not. It is priests who sharpen the edges of our souls, and the priestly period had not yet begun for India. There is so far nothing corresponding to the Palestinian rabbi, with his instinctive recognition of cankers. Buddha, already on friendly terms with the Hindu Pantheon, could behave with perfect politeness to the new troupe from Greece. Pessimistic, and inclined to cynicism despite his compassionate heart, he knew that religion is not a ready habit of the mind, superior to most habits, but like them to be abandoned before we escape from the Wheel—to be lived down, in fact, although the process may extend over a thousand of our lives. Whether men gained good or evil from gymnastic exercises would depend on their own predispositions; it could have nothing to do with the origin of gymnasiums. Such was the spirit of India, as powerful as the conscious national spirit of the Jews, as the sequel shows. For in a few generations the Hellenic influences died out, not through persecution, but because their day was ended. Poseidon becomes Siva on the coins, Artemis a wild Apsara, and the Greek typhon and the Indra are sculptured in the temple of Amaravati. There is a break in Indian records about 400 A.D., when a medieval darkness descends. But before that break comes the Greeks and their ideals have disappeared.

In modern times this episode has produced a controversy. Some critics have declared that Alexander the Great is the true begetter of Indian civilization, and that Indian art in particular could never have arisen without the assistance of Europe. A shallow and impudent theory: it is now discredited, and we are in more danger from the critics of the opposing school, who assert that Greek influence, so far as it existed, is bad, and that all Greco-Buddhist statues are imitative and mechanical. Mr. Bannerjee, in his excellent book, goes carefully into the question. He is a patriot, but he also cares to get at the truth, and his verdict is that the influence of Greece in India, though slight, was stimulating, and revived parts of an organism which were lying dormant or tending to decay. He does not indulge in rhetoric or generalities; the verdict is built up from considered cases, and we feel at the end that though he has not the mental push of Mr. Bentwich, he has more of the Historical spirit.

The passage of time has almost expelled both Jehovah and Buddha from their holy places; almost, but not quite—the parallel is curious here. The glory is gone from Mount Moriah, but the rock—where Abraham offered Isaac remains, and the Dome of the Rock covers it, a prologue extinguisher, which Zionists would probably remove. The glory is also gone from Bodh-Gaya, where Buddha obtained enlightenment, but a small temple exists, where he is adored by favour of the British Government in a half-hearted fashion. Bodh-Gaya is a sunken area; standing on its edge, one looks down on a tangle of paths and votive bells. No Indians worship there, for Buddhism has died out of India, in accordance with its own law. But pilgrims from Thibet sometimes light lamps so that the floor of the temple looks like a lake of fire and streams of hot air agitate the dirty banners above the image. Behind the temple is a neglected tree, descendant of the Bo tree where Buddha obtained enlightenment; the regions of the sky grew clear, the moon shone forth, showers of flowers fell down from the sky upon the earth, and the night gleamed like a spotless maiden. Where are those flowers? "Rams and righteousness!" thunders Jehovah. Where is that righteousness? "Nothing in excess," murmured Athene to them both, and disappeared more completely than either. . . . And amid the contradictory echoes humanity moves forward, stumbling and jibbing upon its own painful road, and obstinately refusing to accept salvation.

THE ECONOMIC TYRANNY

Social Economics. By Professor J. Hartley Jones. (Methuen. 6s. net.)

WHAT Professor Jones calls Social Economics is our ancestors to call Political Economy. Those were the days when men thought politics so important that they had to prefix "political" to economics before any one would believe that the subject was a serious one. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the world was still living under the tyranny of political ideas and political institutions, and passions played around the thrones of kings, Upper Chambers, Reform Bills, and all the paraphernalia of political democracy which has just been exploded by the up-to-date Russian. In the last hundred years we have passed from this political into an economic phase of European civilization, although we moribund Westerners refuse to acknowledge it, and still mumble over our political shibboleths. But it is passion which shows where the vital spark still lingers in society, and to-day the only questions which can make people angry and unreasonable are economic questions. There is but one member in the present House of Commons, one of the members for the City of London, who can get up any heat, whether of support or opposition, over a proposal to add ten million voters to the register. But if any one begins to talk about key industries, coal trade unions, or syndicalism, or a levy on capital, or shop stewards, or the dictatorship of the proletariat, there is a rush of blood to the head and the sparks fly. The tyranny of politics and politicians has given way to the tyranny of economics and economists, and the world is induced to believe that the whole duty of man consists in either making profits or earning wages or destroying capitalists or running Soviets. How many people realize that Lenin and Trotsky are only political economists like Adam Smith and the respectable Ricardo, and that their power comes from the fact that we have allowed society to fall under the tyranny of economics?

Hence Professor Jones is right to call his book "Social Economics." The title has the rare merit of fitting the subject. And the book itself is admirable—admirable because, like so few books on industrial reconstruction and the pathological economics of society, it is really useful. Professor Jones has both a practical and a theoretical knowledge of the financial, commercial, and industrial system, and with considerable acuteness, clearness, and impartiality, he analyses the most important facts and assumptions which underlie that system. The consequence is that he gives the reader the best bird's-eye view which we know of industrial problems as they actually exist to-day, while at the same time he shows the relation of these problems to economic theory in such a lucid and simple way that even the uninitiated ought to be able to understand it. That curious creature "the ordinary reader" will not find the book easy to read because it is short, concisely written, and packed with material; but, if he read it with the necessary concentration, he will find no real difficulty in understanding it, and at the end he will at least possess a certain amount of knowledge to justify him in getting angry over capitalists and workers or trade unions and shop stewards or the democratic control of industry or women's wages. The book can also be read with profit by those who consider themselves to be economic experts. Though Professor Jones maintains a wonderful level of impartiality, he does not conceal his own views on the main problems of industrial reconstruction and the organization of an economic society. One may not always agree with those views, but they are at least supported by arguments which merit respect and consideration.
MR. FREEMAN'S POETRY

Poems, New and Old. By John Freeman. (Selwyn & Blount: 10s. 6d. net.)

In far-off happier days Oscar Wilde could talk about chrysoprase and the Sphinx's agate claws, Mr. Noves could marvel of Apes and ivory, skulls and peacocks in junkus from old Hongkong, Sailing over a silvery sea to a shimmering isle of song (or words to that effect), and it was all considered extremely poetical. The expensiveness of the material made up for any defects in the spiritual significance of the work of art. We forgot that the table was of Louis-Philippe design, and remembered only the richness of its gilded legs and its malachite top. But there came a time when these sumptuous and exotic beauties began to pall. Sick of lilies, Mrs. Gimbly Brown turned to sunflowers—to blossoms even homelier, daisies, dandelions, thistles. The cult of simplicity, of unadorned austerity began. From being twopence and coloured, verse turned to penny and plain. The lispers lispèd, the ascetics of the intellect mortified their poetical flesh. Richard Middleton's "Domes of desire and purple halls of sin" (again we quote from a rather feeble memory) were exchanged for nurseries and monastic cells. And how delightful, in the first flush of novelty, these new surroundings seemed! But the novelty has worn off, and there are some of us (dare we whisper it?) who hanker, not indeed after the old chrysoprase, but at least after something a little gayer, a little more grown-up than what is offered from the vessel of art.

Mr. Freeman is one of the ascetics. He denies himself the luxuries of picturesqueness, of chiming rhyme and easy rhythms, of rich outlandish words, of pointed phrases that stick deep in the memory. Gold and jewels have been fashioned by vulgar craftsmen into vulgar works of art; therefore Mr. Freeman will have none of them. He has set himself the task of creating poetical beauty out of language essentially dry and colourless and sawdusty. The task is not, for a great poet, an impossible one. Words in themselves dry and colourless are often the best vehicles for the expression of the intensest emotion; there will be nothing in the medium to distract the mind from what is being expressed. Asceticism in the intellect, as well as in the moral sphere, is usually accompanied by intense passions and emotions. The intellectual self-denial of Blake in the songs, or of Wordsworth in the "Lyrical Ballads," makes only more apparent the emotional force which inspired the poems. But suppose there were no emotion behind the asceticism of the language? What then? What was dry and colourless will remain dry and colourless. We shall not even have the conjuring-trick type of poem, the lovely creation of words produced by intellectual magic out of the empty hat. We shall find merely a heap of sawdust.

In most of the poems contained in this thick volume we feel the presence of an asceticism unjustified by an intense emotion. That there is some emotion behind them all is obvious: Mr. Freeman enjoys looking at trees, listening to the wind, walking through the fields; so do we all. But the mere enjoyment of country life is in itself quite uninteresting. We demand from the poet that he shall give to an emotion which we all feel some fresh significance, that he shall look on familiar sights with eyes that discover new and surprising beauties. This is what we demand, and, except on the rarest occasions, we demand from Mr. Freeman in vain. The fundamental defect of his poetry is that it is extremely dull. Compare him with Wordsworth, the poet with whom he asks, by his theme, to be compared. In reading Mr. Freeman's poetry we never for an instant feel that profound emotional excitement which the best, the genuinely poetical, passages of Wordsworth produce upon the mind. Wordsworth's emotions reinforce and make significant one's own feelings towards nature. Mr. Freeman's do not: indeed, when one has actually finished reading, one cannot remember what are the emotions—beyond a vague enjoyment—which Mr. Freeman expresses. Wordsworth's pictures remain clearly and precise in the memory; one can see the black peak as it rises over the horizon, growing bolder and bolder to the rower's eyes with every stroke of the oars; one can see the aged yew trees; one can see the daffodils and the poet wandering lonely, in body as well as in spirit, as a cloud. But of Mr. Freeman's landscapes it is possible to retain only the dimmest impression; there is scarcely a scene that one can remember distinctly and sharply. With studied restraint of rhyme and rhythm and vocabulary, with great accomplishment and the most impeccable taste, deliberately and at considerable length, Mr. Freeman tells us—almost nothing at all. That is why his poetry, which one reads with a kind of negative pleasure—a pleasure derived from the fact that one is never "let down" by it, never in the least shocked—slips from the mind, as soon as one has finished reading, like water off a stone, leaving no impression behind. It is only very occasionally, two or three times in these three hundred pages, that one comes upon something that penetrates and remains.

As clear and still she stood, moonlike remotely near,
I saw and heard her breathe, I years and years away.
Her light streamed through the years, I saw her clear and still,
—Shape and spirit together mingling night with day.

Water falling, falling with the curve of a stream;
Over green-hued rock, then plunging to its pool
Far, far below, a falling spear of light;
Water falling golden from the sun, moonlike coœ!
Water has the curve of her shoulder and breast,
Water falls as straight as her body rose,
Water her brightness has from neck to still feet,
Water crystal-cold as her cold body flows.

In these lines there is new individual beauty, clearly and precisely seen and expressed. We remember them, when the rest, however carefully made, however faultless in taste, are quite forgotten.

WENSLEYDALE, WITH COVERDALE, BISHOPDALE, AND SEMERWATER. By Ernest E. Taylor. "Handy Guide Series." (British Periodicals. 7d. )—Stainmore Forest and the upper parts of Wensleydale were among the regions explored by that common-sense married couple, John Buncle, or his creator and prototype Thomas Amory, who discovered somewhere about here frightful perpendicular rocks, unfathomable chasms, a lake so deep that its waters were evidently connected with the abyss, and a burning fountain. Mr. Taylor, familiar as he is with the topographical and other literature of the district, does not mention Buncle or Mr. Amory.

Sir John Mandeville, that he found there; but he describes the Buttertubs, Hardraw Force and the other incomparable waterfalls, Semerwater ("the only genuine lake in Yorkshire," he calls it, but is not the larger Malham Tarn a genuine lake?), the caves, and the abbeys, manor-houses, and other things that give Wensleydale so many varied attractions. When was the name Yoredale supplanted by the less appropriate Wensleydale, after a village "originally Woden's Lea"? The old name is preserved in the geological term Yoredale shales, describing the soft strata alternating with harder limestone which have produced the picturesque waterfalls on the river—"or Yore"—and its tributaries, of which the largest is, perhaps, best seen by the tourist as a multitude of limpid cascades dropping over innumerable ledges. To have seen it in flood, a huge catactar making the rocky wharves on each side tremble with the passage of an earthquake, is a sensation we shall never forget. The old name left traces in Yore Bridge and elsewhere. Is it correct to see an Anglo-Saxon suffix in Burterset and Appersett? More probably these, and perhaps also the numerous "Seats," come from the Norse Sæter, and represent Scandinavian settlements. Thoraby, Thoresby, and many other names have a Latin root. Taylor's guide is a model—learned, but not obtrusively so, practical, readable and seductive, and surprisingly full and compact.
MR. McDOWALL’S argument in this beautifully printed book is a little difficult to follow because of its implicit reference to previous works of his own which we have not read. Roughly, however, we understand it as an attempt to give Croce’s theory of esthetic a transcendental completion reaching its pinnacle in the Christian theology. The author starts with the now familiar thesis that beauty is the expression of an intuition and that the appreciation of beauty is a recreation for oneself of the artist’s intuitions. Accepting this, he is dissatisfied with what seems to him on the one hand an insufficient analysis, and on the other an inadequate recognition of the position of beauty in the scheme of man’s spiritual values.

So far we are inclined to sympathize with Mr. McDowell.
Like him, we require to know of what is the intuition which being expressed is Beauty; like him, we feel that it is inadequate to make what seems to us the most delicate of human faculties hardly more than the provider of raw material for the concept-making activity. We are therefore prepared to accept the author’s view that the intuition is an intuition of reality and that the subsequent system of aesthetic intuitions is autonomous in other words, that it needs no reinforcement or sublimation by the logical faculty; it affords a complete vision of the universe.

At this point, however, we can follow the author no longer. To be precise, on p. 33 of his book we are left gasping by this sudden question:

If Reality be, as we have elsewhere argued, grounded on Personal Relationship, the self-expression of Love, does Beauty cease when personal relations become perfect?

We feel in ourselves too much humility to answer Yes or No. The categories are too strange, and since the remainder of Mr. McDowell’s theory moves intimately among them, we are forced to suspend judgment. In less aridous regions, however, we are not convinced by his argument:

When you see beauty in a natural object the matter is less clear.
Croce would say you are in the first stage of knowing that object, and you are unquestionably right so far. But can we not, using the analogy of the picture or the poem, go on to say that you are following after the idea of the end of the natural object you are in touch with the Cosmic Idea, which is the idea of a Personal God? If so, there is indeed room for mysticism, for mysticism becomes simply the realization that you are in fact doing this.

Arguments by analogy are never so suspect as they are on the lips of one anxious “to leave room for mysticism.” There are quite enough x quantities in any theory of aesthetic without our importing any that are not strictly necessary. As a matter of fact the appreciation of beauty in natural objects is no more (and no less) mysterious than the primary process of intuition which is the basis of the theory of Croce accepted by Mr. McDowell.
The admirer of a landscape gives expression within himself to his own intuition. Entia non sunt multiplicanda.

In short, although we may be disposed to believe that an intuitive theory of aesthetic does in fact involve a metaphysic, in so far as we are compelled (by our sense that art does not swing idly in vacuo) to postulate that the intuition is an intuition of reality, this reality is by hypothesis immediately given, and therefore is incapable of further definition. When, therefore, Mr. McDowell invites us to believe that this reality consists of the hypostatized intuitions of a Personal God, or that it is based upon Personal Relationship, we can only say that he has brought his conclusions with him to the argument.
It is only an illusion that they are derived from it, and the illusion is made possible only by the illegitimate use of argument by analogy.

M. GALSOWORTHY

PLAYS, FOURTH SERIES: “A Bit o’ Love”; “The Foundations”; “The Skin Game.” By John Galsworthy. (Duckworth. 7s. net.)

I

one of the “Lettres à l’Amazone” Remy de Gourmont congratulates himself that he has never written a novel or story whose emotional interest was derived from the relation between human beings and the social conventions. His interest was always with the emotions in themselves—with emotion, as it were, in the void. Mr. Galsworthy may congratulate himself on precisely the contrary achievement; he has never written anything in which the emotional interest was not derived from the relation between his characters and the social conventions that envelop them. Which of the two authors has more right to be proud? Neither, we imagine; for an exclusive preoccupation with man as a dateless individual is as much unjustified by the facts of existence as is the exclusive preoccupation with man as a social being. But Gourmont is obviously right to this extent, that the literature of social problems, “repertory” literature, possesses life and value only so far as its characters are real, individual human beings. The problem does not make the play; it is the characters that cause us to be interested in, or tolerant of, the problem.

This fourth volume of Mr. Galsworthy’s plays is hardly up to the best of his earlier dramatic work. Of the three plays which it contains, “The Skin Game,” now being performed at the St. Martin’s Theatre, is the most skilfully and convincingly written; but even “The Skin Game” leaves us comparatively cold. We derive from it none of the thrills which “The Silver Box,” “Joy” or “Justice” made us feel. This may, of course, be due in part to the fact that we have grown stale to Mr. Galsworthy’s method and point of view. But it is also, we think, true that the characters in “The Skin Game” are definitely less interesting, less completely realized than those of the earlier plays. The problem in this play has definitely got the better of the human beings. Hillcist is the type of ancient territorial gentlemanners, Hornblower of business pushfulness, Jill and Rolf of the Younger Generation. If one does not happen to be interested in the relations between class and class, generation and generation, but only in the strangeness, the greatness, the absurdities of human character, then one will find “The Skin Game” an uninteresting piece of literature.

In “The Foundations” Galsworthy treats the agonizing of the classes, not with the solemnity usually accorded to the theme, but in a spirit of extravagant comedy. The result is not altogether happy. One feels all the time that Mr. Galsworthy is out of his element.
He has tried to achieve that combination of high jinks with pathos which is Sir James Barrie’s special “stunt.” But the jinks are not high enough, and instead of delicately romantic pathos we get stuff that is often perilously like the journalism so admirably satirized in the person of “The Press.” The same journalism which renders suspect the pathos of Mrs. Lemmy in “The Foundations” can be detected again in “A Bit o’ Love.” We cannot help feeling throughout that the whole story has been “worked up” by a skilful reporter. The final scene, with its stage moon, its dancing children, its music, its attempted suicide, is too picturesque by half. Tragedy is purer and austere than this.

The President and Council of the Royal Academy have purchased the following works under the terms of the Chantry Bequest: “Feeding the Fowls,” oil painting, by Mr. Fisher, R.A.; and “The Sun Down” and “Suburban Day,” oil painting, by Alfred J. Munnings, A.R.A. On the whole, we must congratulate the Academy on its choice. These are certainly two of the best pictures in the present exhibition, SECRETS OF LONDON

Unknown London. By Walter George Bell. (Lane. 6s. 6d. net.)

THE eighteenth century was lively, if not merry, at Wapping-in-the-Woz. The roomy windows of scores of timber-fronted taverns overlooked from the narrow caseway the busy Thames, glittering through the pearly mist which arose from the restless water. The sunbeams glittered on the surface, like the flashes in a spinhalscope. Then, as now, the tides bore craft from every sea. High across the stream stood out the slender steeple of St. Mary’s Church at Redriff. Near by, in the modern church of St. Paul, it is in keeping with the traditions of this riverside district that some of the furniture is made of wood from Nelson’s “Fighting Téméraire.” Braced by liberal tots of rum or draughts of strong October, and exalted by song or hornpipe above all vulgar cares, Jack and Sue, lurking forth from one or other of the Wapping inns, not seldom encountered a grim and disconcerting pageant: Driving down the crowded High Street came the Marshal of the Admiralty, preceded by a man carrying a silver ear. With him were City Marshals, sheriffs’ officers, and one or more repulsive functionaries, of whom advancing civilization has not even taught us to be rid. These people were about the horrid business of escorting pirates, or other sinners on the high seas, to the Execution Dock (now filled in), which adjoined the place where to-day is Tunnel Pier. The culprits were hanged at low-water mark. Three tides washed over the bodies, which in the case of pirates were then exposed to rot—hideous, crow-peeked things—in iron nets, at Bugsky’s Hole, or elsewhere down the stream.

But the whirl of Wapping is still by ever. Ichabod is upon the walls and the dozen of Thames deserted “stairs.” The district has a mournful isolation; and the High Street is a via dolorosa. Few besides workers at the docks, Customs men, and wharfingers populate the place—which the stranger may reach on foot by strolling along St. Katharine’s Way. A brief visit will satisfy the most ardent London ODysseus, or tourist from the New World striving to acquire an “extensive and peculiar” knowledge of the old.

Three conspicuous figures are associated with Wapping: the bibulous Jeffrey of Wen, whose ill-timed drink at the “Red Cow” was the prelude to his confinement and death in the Tower; Captain William Kidd, convicted on insufficient evidence of piracy, and hanged in 1701 at Execution Dock, with the bizarre solemnities sketched above; and the elder Charles Dibdin, who neither lived in Wapping nor wrote the words to John Percy’s famous air, but left other songs in which the place-name recurs as insistently as the drum-taps in “Parsifal.” The man Dibdin may not have possessed all the virtues ascribed by the Abbot of Rievaulx to the Scottish King David I.; but it is undeniable that the Southampton ballad-writer, by his ninety sea-songs—“Blow High, Blow Low,” “Meg of Wapping,” “Every Inch a Sailor,” “Tom Bowling,” and the rest—exercised throughout the Napoleonic campaigns a popular influence which was powerful, far-reaching, in many ways good, and (though pitched on a different keynote) not altogether incomparable with the effect produced in Germany, during the War of Liberation, by the songs of E. M. Arndt, K. Th. Körner, and Max von Schenkendorf—and also, at a later date, by those of Hoffmann von Fallersleben. And some of Dibdin’s best songs in style recall, longo intervalla, the spirited lyrics of Gustave Nadaud.

The foregoing meditations upon Wapping and its worthies are evoked by a chapter in this new work by the author of “Fleet Street in Seven Centuries.” The book is too discursive; but although Mr. Bell is capricious in his choice of examples of “unknown” London, he not infrequently hits the mark.

It is astonishing how little of London the average Londoner knows. Between the green pleasantness of link-extinguished Berkeley Square, with the heraldic beehives of the house of Petty, and the desolate emptiness of such a spot as Labour-in-Vain Street, Shadwell, the distance is great, and the contrast is greater. Wider still is the chasm which separates the attractive cluster of odd little shops to which is given the name of Shepherd Market from the malebolge of courts, alleys and “rents” in the east- and south-east parts of the town. Some of these an exalted personage not long ago justly described as “darnable.” As huge a gulf exists between the spruce and cheerful Hay Hill, and the dull mirth of sleeping-boxes in Dockland. In that last-named dreary region Capitalism, a guscia di maciulla, champs in its myriad mouths the struggling tollers. It is hard to realize that on decorous Hay Hill the quarters of Sir Thomas Wyatt were once exposed upon a gallows, like joints of meat on a butcher’s block. All these places, to tens of thousands of matter-of-fact and placid citizens, who keep to the main roads, are as unfamiliar as the signs of Gobi or the temples of Copán.

Pennyfields, and the adjacent Causeway, where bland, inscrutable Chinamen get solace from chuck-a-luck or fantan, and a quiet whiff from a long-stemmed pipe with a tiny bowl; Hogarth’s house at Chiswick; the remnants of the Southwark prisons, for eternities of freedom, for those who seek them; Chiswick water-tower; the venerable churches in Cheyne Walk and Austin Friars; and the grey, secluded Charter-house, are perhaps less generally known than London Stone, and the Roman bath in Strand Lane. For the last-named hardly landmarks, which Mr. Bell has not omitted from his book, are in the central parts of the town, just as are Prince Henry’s Room, the “Cheshire Cheese,” and the caverns in the Adelphi. More remote, no doubt, is the fragment (described by Mr. Bell) of a hypocaust beneath the Coal Exchange. But a good deal might be written about the queer little clothes market in Borer’s Passage, with Seven-Step Alley, and other places in that exotic district. The common hugger of the beaten track would as soon expect to find a new-laid egg of a Great Ankk upon the porters’ rest in Piccadilly as a hundred-feet stretch of the medivial wall of London, nearly forty feet high, in actual use as the backbone of some bonded warehouses in Cooper’s Row. Mr. Bell gives a good account of this. The rampart behind the ancient brastework can be paced by the citizen of to-day; and young visitors to the basement, who are frisky enough to loop over a number of butts, of vinous and agreeable perfume, will find themselves in an interesting hole, with Roman tiles and flints in situ. Of easier access is the length of the wall in Trinity Place, by Tower Hill. Other fragments are at no. 1, Crutch’d Friars; under the ground-floor of the Bowyer Tower; and close to the remnant of the defunct Wardrobe Tower, south-east of Gundulf’s Keep. Many Londoners, we suppose, have visited the place of martyrdom near the church of St. Bartholomew. Probably few have seen the remarkable view from St. Edward’s Tower, the campanile of Westminster Cathedral; have walked in the garden where the platoons of Malkin arch their backs on Richard Penderel’s grave; or have strolled through Ormond Yard, in which, so far, the housebreaker has spared some wood-galleried houses of respectable antiquity.

Printers, whom the ham rolls and linseed oil of Fetter Lane have ceased to charm, or Chancery Lane lawyers, brought by forensic strife nearly to the state of the Norman king who suffered so terribly from that superfluity of lampreys, are apt to forget that a few steps will take them to a room where frayed nerves may be soothed by a sight of the most valuable national record in the world—Domestic Book (which by reason of its uniqueness is of greater interest even than the copies of Magna Carta): together with which are to be seen the earliest extant sign manual of an English king, the Papal bull confirming to King Henry VIII. the title of “Fidei Defensor,” the shaky signature of the Gunpowder Plot man after he was tortured, the famous Belgian “scrap of paper,” and an infinity of other treasures. The little-known museum in which these rarities are stored is rightly included by our author in his book.

A SIMPLE FOREIGNER

London through Chinese Eyes. By M. T. Z. Tyau. (Swarthmore Press. 15s. net.)

Mr. Tyau, as a simple-minded foreigner, has fallen a victim to that strange official language in which King’s proclamations, Ministerial speeches and political surveys in the monthlies are written. He has been struck deaf and blind by sonorous general statements. He came to this country, a young, earnest student of law, fully prepared to admit Western superiority. He had listened eagerly to tales of England’s greatness; he had listened with humility and awe. He stepped ashore in a spirit of reverent curiosity. Now this attitude, however proper it may be in a foreigner, does not impress a good inquirer. Mr. Tyau never overcame his prepossession. He seems never to have looked at anything in England unless he had first read a leading article about it. As a result his book reads as if it had been written by a moderately conservative morning paper. It is hardly human, to say nothing of Chinese.

The one point on which Mr. Tyau seems definitely to have resisted the hypnotic effect of the leading article is the institution of the family. He cannot really reconcile himself to the appalling English neglect of parents by children. He turns hopefully to all his phrases: “the individualistic system develops originality and self-reliance”; “the survival of the fittest”—but this time the booming avalanche descends in vain. He is nearly buried, but when the noise is stilled he hears a little voice within him talking pure Chinese, and it is saying that English family life is abominable. Try as he may, he cannot get over this extraordinary prejudice. It is so strong in him that he even disapproves of English marriages because they take place without the parents’ consent. His indignation overflows till it embraces the English marriage preliminaries, and he states that such preliminaries should be more ‘gentle’ and not ‘common public exhibitions.’ But this is the one point where he is really roused. On matters of morality he is usually incredibly urbane. On pressing social questions, such as Labour, he reads a Labour paper and a Conservative paper, and combines the points of view. If only we could believe this method to result from profound indifference we should be more interested. But we fear it is an exhibition of ‘broad-mindedness.’

On the whole, then, we draw the moral that a foreigner should not read about the country he visits before he visits it: he is almost sure to read the wrong things and, unless he is exceptionally sensitive to facts, he will see each separate item, not in itself, but merely as an example of a phrase. We may, of course, have misjudged Mr. Tyau. He is, after all, a Chinese and, presumably, acute. His incredibly accommodating book may have been written for English consumption. But we fear this suggestion is merely the product of our romantic imagination; we fear that, in truth, Mr. Tyau’s superhuman blandness conceals no reserves.

IN THE LIGHT OF THE WAR

Stevenson’s Germany. By C. Brunsdon Fletcher. (Heinemann 12s. net.)

This book, which groups about Stevenson’s “Footnote to History” evidence of German misbehaviour in the Pacific, and particularly in Samoa, is, we are informed by the Preface, the conclusion of an argument against Germany, begun in ‘The New Pacific’, and continued through ‘The Problem of the Pacific’; it is essentially an attempt to show that Germany is unfit to govern in the islands of the South Sea, and a plea that in no circumstances whatever she should be allowed to regain control of those profitable lands.

A quotation will serve to put us on the track of the flaw in Mr. Fletcher’s argument: “In the light of the present war ‘A Footnote to History’ simply reveals as in a flash a ruthless, unprincipled Germany.” Mr. Fletcher does not realize, it would seem, that the light of the recent war was a kind of limelight, worked to a great extent deliberately, turned only upon suitable objects, and by its arbitrary distribution of lights and shadows distorting the real proportions and characteristics of the drama. The limelight still works, though not quite so vigorously; it is not convenient to turn it upon the starving crowds of Vienna or the underfed German millions.

The most elementary common sense combined with a moderate degree of observation should make it plain that during the last six years anything that might reflect credit on the Germans has been suppressed, whatever dishonoured them has been thrown into relief and embroidered according to various fancies, and that we have applied the reverse process to our allies and ourselves. Now if you take all Jones’ vices, and those alone, and compare them with all Smith’s good points, omitting to mention his faults, you will obtain a flattering, if rather insipid portrait of the latter, and a terrifying, if incredible picture of the former.

Mr. Fletcher argues that although individual German traders and administrators may have dealt fairly with natives, yet up to 1900 the policy of the German Government was grasping in intention, brutal and unscrupulous in its methods; that although, at any rate between 1900 and 1912, German rule in Samoa was enlightened, and although many Samoans still regard Germany as a friend, yet this must on no account be taken as evidence that she may be trusted to behave well in future. Only the fear of publicity, Mr. Fletcher assures us, induced her to behave well. But how does Mr. Fletcher know? And if he is right, why should not the fear of publicity have a similar wholesome effect in future? Is not the fear of publicity one of the restraints on the cruder impulses of all governments, giving the opportunity for gentler counsels to prevail? There should be no need to point out at this moment of history that England’s treatment of subject races is not invariably and solely determined by moderation, good-humour, and tact.

There may be good and just reasons for excluding Germany from the Pacific, but they do not appear conclusively in this book. What appears too clearly is the desire to profit to the utmost by her downfall; to remember of her past only the misdeeds, partly due to a form of government she has renounced; to regard her as incurably brutal, rapacious, treacherous—in fact, to view her solely “in the light of the present war.” Mr. Fletcher, whose book is published in 1920, might have reconsidered that phrase and others, asking himself what judgment history will pass on his idols, in the light of the present peace.

A MODEL STORY

THE THIRD WINDOW. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. (Scriber, 6s. net.)

It takes but a page or two of Mrs. Sedgwick's new book for the reader to be aware that she has chosen to set herself a delicate, difficult task. The form of "The Third Window" is that of a prolonged short story, and she has divided it into ten parts—ten stages of a journey that begins in pale high silvery light and ends in darkness. In the problem the author has chosen, and in her manner of stating it, there is something essentially modern. Indeed, so strongly does the reader feel this that he can hardly imagine it being written yesterday or to-morrow; it is of to-day—Spring, 1920. One might even go so far as to say that it is exquisitely, eminently fashionable. But what is our emotion as we lay the book down—what effect has it produced upon us? Has it quickened our perception, or increased our mysterious response to Life? Do we feel that we have partaken of the author's vision—that something has been revealed to us that are the richer for having seen? Is there ever one single moment when it seems to us that she herself, for all her careful control, is borne away so that she is as unconscious of her audience as are all of stage and setting? The door shuts up on us without a sound; we walk on velvet. There is never a jarring note, or one clash of colour that was not intended. What should be polished is revealed and beautifully spaced; yet is our attention never challenged. So discreet, so watchful is the light that we play with the idea that it has been captured by the author and made to do her bidding.

Nothing is missing; there are even real flowers, windflowers in glasses showing their rosy stems; there is even a sock with the needles left in and a morsel of embroidery lying on a citrus-and-white striped chiffon chair in this model story. Even without the people, the setting is—is it not?—charming, highly civilized, suggesting in all its appointments and perfections a background for a drama that, and with high reserves will take the place of simple avowals. But here we pause. Here we begin to wonder whether real people could survive these surroundings. We remember finding ourselves in the boudoir of a model flat, and hearing our companion whisper in the voice that is reserved for those occasions: "Oh, it won't do, it won't do. If he put down his gloves the whole scheme would come tumbling about their ears. And supposing she took off her hat... The risk—the risk!"

There are three characters in "The Third Window," two women and a man. Very carefully Mrs. Sedgwick draws them for us—Antonia, the young war widow, tall, pale and opulent, with the mark on her eyelid that looked like the freckling of a lovely fruit; Bevis, her husband's friend, thin, wasted, one-legged since the war; and Miss Latimer, sister of the dead man, the virgin who will at all costs keep the lamp he treasured so fondly on earth still burning for him and for him alone. The third window is the window that overlooked the flagged paths, the ancient cedar, the white frilliantes planted by Malcolm, and the fountain he loved to stand beside. It was when Antonia confessed her dread of that window and of seeing the ghost of Malcolm there that Bevis asked her to marry him. And the day after she told him fully of her fear that there should be immortality, her fear or her delight—either, both. Bevis "believes," and Miss Latimer is certain when Antonia questions her. Finally, in a queer half-desperate, half-defiant mood, Antonia persuades them to play at table-turning, and, naturally with Miss Latimer as the medium, the fatal message is rapped out. Two days later, after a long talk with her lover, after Bevis has had a white, blazling, baring scene with Miss Latimer, Antonia kills herself. She cannot face the difficulty. And we have Miss Latimer, like a priest, very content with the sacrifice, and the twice-broken man... Here is a plot, you see, which has great possibilities. There is a stage if one might say so, the bones of a real problem in such a situation. But we do not think Mrs. Sedgwick has faced it. For all her cleverness and brilliance and faintly exotic vocabulary will not help her to make living, breathing, human beings out of these three portraits to fit a scene. They do fit it; indeed, they are so enveloped and enfolded that the scene and the tragedy close over their heads. Let us give a small example of Mrs. Sedgwick's way of writing. Antonia suspects Bevis of seeing in her "induced emotions."

I rather like induced emotions in you... They suit you. They are like the colour of a pomegranate, or the taste of a mulberry, or the smell of a bough of flowering hawthorn; something rich, thick and pleasingly oppressive.

In our opinion this is "model" conversation as well.

A SPRING TO CATCH WOOD-COCKS

POTTERISM. By Rose Macaulay. (Collins. 7s. 6d. net.)

In this new novel by Miss Macaulay it is not only her cleverness and wit which are disarming. It is her coolness, her confidence, her determination to say just exactly what she intends to say whether the reader will or no. We are conscious, while the dreadful truth escapes us, of a slight bewildered feeling of, almost, a sense of pique. After all, what right has the author to adopt this indifferent tone towards us? What is the mystery of her offhand, lightly-smiling manner? But these little, quick, darting fishes of doubt remain far below our surface until we reach the book; we are conscious of them, and that is all. The rest of us is taken up with the enjoyment of "Potterism," with the description of the Potter Press and what it stands for. It is extraordinarily pleasant to have all our frantic and gloomy protestations and furies against "Potterism" gathered up and expressed by Miss Macaulay with such precision and glittering order—it is as though she has taken all those silly stones we have thrown and replaced them with swift little arrows. "How good that is, how true!" we exclaim at every fresh evidence of Potterism and every fresh exposure of a Potterite. ... But then there is her plot to be taken into account. It is very slight. She has simply traced a simple line to the most important, the most defined anti-Potterites and Potterites. Potterism is the strongest power that rules England to-day; the anti-Potterites are that small handful of people, including ourselves, whose every breath defies it. And what happens to them? Here those small fishes begin to grow very active, to flirt their fins, flash to the surface, leap, make bubbles. This creates a strange confusion in our minds. For the life of us we can't for the moment see, when all is said and done, which are which. Is it possible that we ourselves are only another manifestation of the disease? Who has won, after all? Who shall say where Potterism ends? It is easy to cry: "If we must be flung at anything, let us be flung at lions." But the very idea of ourselves as being flung is an arch-Potterism in the bargain.

The Council of the Stage Society announce that their next production will be "Le Paquebot Tenacity," a comedy in three acts by Charles Wildrarc, which the Society will give in a translation by Harold Bowen on the 13th and 14th of June. Sunday evening and Monday afternoon. It is interesting to note that this will be the hundredth production given by the Society since its foundation in 1899, and completes the twenty-first year of its existence.
SPEAKING of the difficulties presented by the character of Hamlet, Mr. Dowden says that most critics have been misled by seizing on certain aspects of Hamlet’s character and ignoring the rest. He gives a list of the qualities included in the total Hamlet, arranging them in pairs. Thus Hamlet is sceptic and believer, courtly and rude, ingenious and direct, humorous and melancholy, a lover and cruel to whom he loves best, and so on for thirteen pairs. These apparent contradictions may or may not be reconciled in Shakespeare’s Hamlet, but the corrugated brows of the critics are sufficient evidence that this is an unfamiliar way of presenting a human being. It is usually assumed that the presence of some qualities involves the absence of others, and, further, we have a rough-and-ready classification, whereby certain qualities occur together. These classifications are, in practice, adopted by all of us, from William James with his division of all humanity into tender-minded and tough-minded people, to the poor little hack novelist for whom all retired Irish Colonels are red-faced, choleric and good-natured. In America, we understand, there are experts who make a good income by correlating various moral and mental qualities with such physical traits as the width between the eyes, the shape of the jaw and the size of the ear-lobes. A great manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway is supposed to have refused all applicants whose fingers were stained with nicotine.

But although the method has its dangers when pursued into details, it is nevertheless true that men fall into types. In the drama and the novel, at any rate, there is such a thing as “consistency” in character, and we insist on consistency in fiction because we find it in life. It should be an interesting question to philosophers to determine how far this consistency extends. Will it ever be possible to deduce, from a man’s behaviour in a Bank Holiday crowd, his views about the Absolute? How many of a man’s beliefs are determined by his “temperament”? We are accustomed to concede to temperament almost the whole realm of art judgments, although even here we meet with what seem to be “objective” standards. Thus we all understand what Sauer, the great pianist, meant when he began an essay by declaring that “The greatest of all composers is Beethoven; my favourite composer is Schumann.” But what does the first part of the sentence really imply? Was it a merely valueless gesture of obedience to authority? If the majority of musicians were like Sauer would Beethoven be the greatest of composers? But to follow up this question would be to rush in where even our modern poet-critics almost fear to tread.

Leaving on one side this aspect of the question, suggesting as it does the “Republic,” the “Poetics,” the Poetry Bookshop Chap-Book and other terrifying works, I have been very interested to discover that, according to Poincaré, even the cogency of a mathematical proof is a matter of temperament. He divides mathematicians into “geometers” and “analysts,” and apparently these two species adopt quite different ways of demonstrating the same thing. Each is uneasy in the presence of the other’s proofs; they may find the proofs unanswerable, but, in some curious way, not completely convincing. If Poincaré is right, and even mathematicians have temperaments, we need not be perplexed at the dimensions of a philosophical library. There are probably as many different unanswerable arguments as there are different philosophers, and as philosophy does not suffer from the disadvantage incidental to mathematics of being occasionally brought to earth and tested by facts, we may expect new philosophical works to appear as long as human nature retains its present richness and variety.

One of the best illustrations of the dependence of opinion on temperament has recently appeared in the press on the occasion of the death of Joselito, the famous Spanish bull-fighter. It appears that Joselito was at the head of the virtuoso school of bull-fighters. He possessed a magnificent technique and great learning. He was the analogue of the “extremely accomplished” verse-writer, or of the learned contrapuntist whose works are models of frigid excellence. Another school of bull-fighters, of which Belmonte is the leader, trust to the inspiration of the moment. They are direct, simple and spontaneously varied in method. They eschew rules and take each bull as it comes. Artists and the common people worship Belmonte; the cultured, connoisseur classes prefer Joselito. Further, the admirers of Belmonte were pro-Ally during the war, while the admirers of Joselito were pro-German. So that Gilbert was probably right when he said that every English child was born a Liberal or a Conservative.

If human beings are really as consistent as this example indicates, the uselessness of argument is more than ever apparent. Reason becomes an instrument for ornamenting unavoidable prejudices. My opinions of Mr. Lloyd George, of Bimetallism, of the validity of Euclid, of Right and Wrong, could have been calculated from my cradle. It becomes evident that the only effective way to make converts is to breed them. We forget that, when the Eugenists gain control of the country, unprecedented intrigues will be set on foot. The poet with high connections will arrange for the procreation of an appreciative audience of not less than twenty thousand. With this solid nucleus of fated adherents he could well trust to chance for world-fame. Immortality would be a matter of bargaining; it would be arranged for, on the give-and-take principle. It already distresses many serious patriots that the only man of our time who seems secure of immortality should be a German-Jew. Such almost criminal absent-mindedness on the part of Providence would be tactfully corrected.

The acute reader will see that the only possible flaw in this prophecy springs from the doubt whether human nature is, in fact, infinitely ductile. Are man’s possibilities of belief, after all, limited? The history of mankind suggests an answer in the negative. A list of man’s opinions since the Creation affords no grounds for pessimism. We can breed for any belief whatever. Our future reputations lie in our own loins.

MR. HARDY’S 80TH BIRTHDAY

The following is the text of the address presented to Mr. Thomas Hardy on his birthday by Mr. Birrell, Mr. Galsworthy and Mr. Anthony Hope on behalf of the Society of Authors:

We, who speak for the Society of Authors, would have your eightieth birthday bring you a sign of our homage and our gratitude. As in honour, so in time, your name stands high upon our roll of membership, for you have been of our Society from its beginning. In 1899 you were asked to take office as our President were, indeed, acclaimed to the post as of indisputable right. Alfred Tennyson and George Meredith had been our Presidents; what name but Thomas Hardy could be set third in that succession without an evident lowering of its reputation?

Not by your name alone have you helped our cause. Always you have shown an eager concern with our work, often have busied yourself to give us counsel. Our every effort on behalf of the Profession of Letters has been strengthened by your sympathy. Therefore to you, our President, we of the Society of Authors are deeply in debt. Words must be a poor payment, but you will let these tell you that we are not ingrateful.

AUTOLOCVS.
If our thanks go to the President of our Society, our homage is made to the Master of our Craft. Here, indeed, we are at one with all who prize literature. Yet, though all can admire the thing wrought, perhaps it is they who themselves practise an art that best can discern the skill of the artist. Even they may doubt what of your work they are to account the highest—your tales, wherein so rare an insight, so passionate a sympathy, picture men and women beset by life's ironies, and your Wessex shines before us with its market-places, sheltered farms, white roads athwart the downs—or your lyrics, of so magical a skill—or that amazing epic given us by your later years.

In this brief letter we can pay no full tribute, and mere praise has ever been little to your taste. Yet on your eightieth birthday we review what time has accomplished, and we desire you to be aware of our belief that your work, which will survive to far-off years, has made, and will make, our England dearer to English folk.

And thus, in deep sincerity, we offer you our thanks, our honour, and our love.

LITERARY GOSSIP

The need for a general reform in our methods of teaching English in schools has long been recognized. Messrs. Dent & Sons propose to do a publisher's part towards it by issuing a series of "King's Treasures of Literature"—the title comes from Ruskin—which will look books to be enjoyed, not to be slaved over. Modern authors will be generously represented; notes will be reduced to a minimum, and that minimum made attractive; the price of each volume will be £1. 6d. or £3. 9d. The guarantee that this valuable programme will be realized is in the name of Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, who is the general editor of the new series.

We have received from Mr. Stuart Mason one of 65 numbered copies of an unpublished poem by Oscar Wilde, the MS. of which (from the collection of J. B. Stetson, Jr.) was sold at the Anderson Galleries in New York on April 23, 1920. The poem, which is slight and charming, was addressed to M. B. J., Margaret Burne-Jones, who subsequently married Mr. J. W. Mackail. The following is the last verse:

And the morning dew-drops glisten,
And the lark is on the wing:
Ah, how can you stop and listen
To what I have to sing!

Mr. John Murray's recent interview in the Pall Mall Gazette has taken the question of book-prices a little more into the open. He states that a book which could be sold at 5s. before the war must now be sold at £1 5s. to pay the publisher. It is difficult to see a remedy. The revival of the three-decker with only a library circulation might help the young novelist; but we doubt whether it would suit the libraries. In the meantime, in spite of the warnings that no publisher would dare to look at a work by an unknown author, we have not heard that young authors find any greater (or any less) difficulty, in getting themselves published than they did before the war.

* * * * *

Nevertheless, one of the effects we anticipate from this state of affairs is an increase in the literary importance of periodicals as a trial ground for young literary talent. Our advice to the publishers is that they should be diligent students of all the literary weeklies, monthlies and quarterlies, whether conservative or advanced. The value of such magazines as Art and Letters, Voices and Coteries in this connection is evident. Publishers are much less able to take risks, it is true, but they need just as much as ever to secure the coming men and women. In fact, the present, in spite of all the practical difficulties, should be the opportunity for the young publisher of real literary discernment.

What is it makes the bibliophile? This ingenious yet puzzling question is suggested by Messrs. Sotheby's catalogue of the ninth and last portion of the Huth Library, which is to be sold on June 22-25. We understand, we should like to afford to be, that bibliophile who possesses the first editions of those authors whom he loves. There is no more rare charm in possessing a favourite author's work in the form in which he himself found it fresh from the press. If the price of an original edition bore some relation to the literary quality of the work we should have found our answer. But we have little doubt that "Westward for Smelts," one of two known copies of a volume of commonplace Elizabethan tales with incidents plagiarized from "The Merry Wives of Windsor," will fetch a great deal more than the £20-30 that is the average auction price of a first edition of a Tourneur play. What is it makes the bibliophile?

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The two days' sale of early English tales, novels and romances from the Britwell Library, to be held by Messrs. Sotheby on the 14th and 15th inst., will offer to collectors of rare books a number of opportunities, unlikely to recur in a lifetime, of obtaining the only copy known of books printed by such men as Wynkyn de Worde. Among the books supposed to be unique are Aneau's "Auctor," priced at £15, "Aeneas in Galicia" by Stetson, a century ago; "Bell, and Theseus," an edition of 1608 which puts back its publication 28 years; four Wynkyn de Worde books, "Syr Dugore," "The Destruction of Jerusalem" (1528), "The Byrth and Prophecye of Marlyne" (1510), and the "Hystorie of Olyver of Castlye" (1518); "Mary of Nemmegen," printed at Antwerp by Dulsburgh; "Roberts' "Haigh for Devonshire"; and "Valentine and Orson," in two editions printed by William Copland. Most of these might be called pedigree books; their descent is registered in famous sales—Befer, the Duke of Roxburghe, White Knights, Stevens and so on; and since a century has failed to produce any rivals, their position may be regarded as secure. A number of other books have had a patent of nobility conferred on them by being selected from the Huth Library by the British Museum; such are the "Historie of Prince Don Bellianis" (1598); Dallington's abridgment of the Hypnerotomachia (1592); and Deloney's "Thomas of Reading" (1612), the fourth edition, but the earliest known. Other books known from the Huth copies are "Ornatus and Artesia" (1634), "Prince Oceander" (1600), "The Knight of the Sun and his brother Rosiclee" (1578), the 1589 "Palmedons," and the 1616 "Palmerin of England." A rather long list of books not in the British Museum could be drawn up, but with the exception of those indicated above as unique, their absence is of little importance as other editions of them are to be found there as a rule. All the celebrated stories are here up to the latter part of the seventeenth century; the new school typified by Mrs. Aphra Behn is unrepresented. It is interesting to be reminded once more of the long popularity of works of romance, as shown not only by their own survival as chap-books but by the assumption of their form by new pieces. They are in fact the only books that still survive from that time, with the exception of poetry, "Amadis of Gaul" can be read, but Barclay's "Argenis" or Calprenede's "Hymen's Preludia" in its thousand folio pages is unreadable. All are here—Lytly, Sidney, Painter, Pettie, Cavendish and Boccaccio.

An illustrated edition of the catalogue (price 7s. 6d.) may be had.

On the 9th and 10th inst. a number of valuable autographs, manuscripts and printed books are to be sold, including some early Scottish charters, a number of Homz and other illuminated manuscripts, a collection of works on aeronautics, Gould's works on birds, and a letter of Queen Elizabeth to the King of France. There are also a few Eastern drawings, but far inferior to those in the magnificent collection of M. Claude Auet which is being sold to-day. The eleven manuscripts with which the sale closes are almost priceless works of beauty, both in writing and in colour.
Science

METHOD AS APPLIED TO MAN

REligion and culture: A CRITICAL SURVEY OF METHODS OF APPROACH TO RELIGIOUS PHENOMENA. By Frederick Schleiermacher, Ph.D. (New York: Columbia University Press; London, Milford: 6d. net.)

A WRITER on method who deals with the shortcomings of constructive thinkers is apt to find himself countered by the retort: Why tell them how to do better, instead of setting them an example by doing better yourself? At the same time, when a student is at that critical point in his career when he is about to break with his leading strings, he may well pause to ask himself whether old hands or young feet are more to be trusted; and it is a healthy sign if his prophetic soul favours the feet.

The present short study sets forth "to investigate the processes of generalization, abstraction and reconstruction, as they are actually carried out in the science of religion, and attempt to bring clearly to light the types of presupposition involved. The question of the possible inadequacy of the source of information is not raised. "Various degrees of excellence characteristic of the raw data, but, on the whole, there is a very considerable amount of a purely descriptive character which is both of a high order and readily available." This is a rather optimistic view of the quality of the evidence on which the anthropologist has to work. Until the world is prepared to pay for first-rate field-work, it will not get it. As things are, however, there are brighter prospects ahead. Schools of anthropology are being formed at leading universities both here and abroad, whence well-trained, if poorly endowed observers are likely to issue in increasing numbers. Indeed, the theorists of the day are largely concerned with the education of these future explorers. Hence their natural function has for some time been that of critics rather than of systematists. They have gone over the old authorities with their students mainly in the hope of kindling in the bosoms of the latter the desire to provide sounder foundations for the science. As for theory, they have mostly been content to supply wholly provisional categories, the use of which is as much to direct the collection and colligation of facts as to foreshadow ultimate explanations. Dr. Schleiters perfectly right in saying, "If we wish to do full justice to the comparative method... we should compare it to the great classificatory period of the natural sciences. But he must not be disappointed if he finds no one to say in the shape of a modern Dr. Casaubon. A "Key to all Mythologies" is unthinkable nowadays. One may, on the other hand, justly complain, if indeed it be worth while, of the crudity of the methods whereby one's deceased grandmother dispatched her eggs.

Anthropology is not an exact science, and never will be. Apart from the question whether any science that deals with concrete fact can be exact, it is easy to show that the science of human life regarded as a concrete fact must, in view of the many incalculable elements involved in the problem, promise no more than probable results. The man is partly like the boy and partly unlike. This process of individual development, in its bodily and mental aspects taken together, can be generalized so as to exhibit a tendency; yet every individual is unique. Again, a man is partly like, partly unlike, his father, or his grandfather, or some ape-like progenitor, or what not. This process of connected change, too, can in vulgar fashion be generalized; yet heredity depends on variation, and variation is miracle. Finally, one state of culture or civilization is partly like, partly unlike, another. The process whereby one passes into another can never be generalized with even the approximate certainty attaching to the so-called laws of individual or racial evolution. A man grows. A family-stock in a different, but analogous sense grows. But culture does not grow at all. It is accumulated, and sheer accident plays a large part in the saving or scattering of the hoard. How customs in themselves happen, or do not happen, to survive is a question beyond the reach of science altogether. So far as history deals with that side of the subject it is a mere chronicle of events. How customs are made to survive, on the other hand, is a scientific question, since human selection can be explained in terms of the innate tendencies of the mind. Thus one can hope to explain in a general way that, given certain cultural conditions, the human mind, or a certain type of human mind, will tend to adopt a certain scheme of life. But that such collocations of conditions are likely to repeat themselves one cannot say beforehand. We cannot scrap our heredity; but we can scrap our civilization at pleasure. If we do so, there is enough of the savage left in us to enable a remnant to become adapted to a savage mode of life; that seems pretty certain. But whether another, and a better, civilization could one day be created must depend on a chapter of accidents; and on this point, therefore, science can make no pronouncement.

ROYAL.—May 13.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair. In a paper entitled "Demonstration of the Apparent 'Growth' of Plants (and of Inanimate Materials) and of their Apparent 'Contractility,'" Mr. A. D. Waller said: In Sir J. C. Bose's original demonstration an amputated leaf was fixed up in connection with a creoeograph, and the indicator was shown to be moving in a direction and at a speed that were attributed to the growth of the leaf. Alternating currents were now sent through the leaf, causing a sudden reversal of the movement of the indicator, e.g., in the demonstration that I witnessed at the Royal Society of Medicine the indicator (a spot of reflected light) moved to the right at what I judged to be something like 1 metre per second in the direction of elongation (by growth?), and flew off the scale in the opposite direction, at least ten times as fast, as soon as the buzz of the exciting coil was heard ('degrowth'). The demonstration was, in my opinion, wholly illusory. The movement to the right (indicating an elongation of petiole = 9 l. a. per second) was indeed consistent with 'growth,' and the movement to the left (indicating a retrograde movement of the petiole) could not be due to such an experiment. The elongation might, however, have been due to, or modified by, many accidental variations of conditions—heat, moisture, handling of plant during preparation, etc., and was precisely similar to the gradual elongation that takes place in a clamp during the same conditions. The second part of the experiment, when the 'excited' plant shortened and caused the indicator to fly off to the left, was, in my eyes, the obvious and conclusive proof of failure. The fact clearly belonged to the familiar phenomena of heat contraction aroused by electrical currents in all kinds of (doubly refracting) moist conductors, whether living or dead, to the study of which our attention was drawn by Engelmann in his famous Lecture of 1885. They are demonstrable with a low-power creoeograph, and play a part in masking or simulating physiological changes when a high power is employed.

The other paper was "On the 'Renal Portal' System (Renal Venous Anomalies) and Kidney Excretion in Vertebrata," by Mr. W. N. F. Woodland.

GEOLOGICAL.—May 19.—Mr. R. D. Oldham, President, in the chair. Mr. C. E. Post and Mr. Brooke Hodgson, of Cordoba, Argentine Republic, were elected Fellows.

The communication read was "On Certain Neolithic Tertiary Minor Intrusions in the Island of Mall (Argyllshire)," by Dr. H. H. Thomas. By chemical analysis, by Mr. E. M. Fisher, the paper dealt with a series of minor intrusions, generally blepharitic, but occasionally composite in character, which are well represented in the western peninsulas of Mall, lying between Loch Scridain and Loch Linnhe, and are remarkable for the number and mineralogical peculiarities of the xenoliths that they contain. Sir Jethro Teall, Mr. G. Barrow and Dr. J. W. Evans congratulated the author upon his paper. Specimens and microscope-slides in illustration of his paper were exhibited by Dr. Thomas. The model of Dip洛дacan, presented to the Society by the Rev. H. N. Hitchens, was also exhibited.
FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 4. King's College, 4.—"Christian Art: Mosaic," Professor P. Dearmer.
Royal Society of Arts, 4.30.—"The Oil Resources of the British Empire," Sir John Cadman.
Philological, 3.30.—Dictionary Evening, Dr. H. Bradley.
Sat. 5. Royal Institution, 3.—"Recent Revolutions in Physical Science: The Theory of Quanta," Dr. J. H. Jeans.
Mon. 7. Institute of Actuaries, 5.—Annual Meeting.
Royal Institution, 8.—General Meeting.

Society of Arts, 8.—"Aluminium and its Alloys," Lecture III., Dr. W. Rosenhain, C.B. (Cantor Lecture.)
Royal Geographical, 8.30.—"Ocean Research in the Dutch East Indies," Professor G. A. F. Molemae.
Tues. 8. University College, 5.30.—"Speech Mixture and Bastard Languages," Professor Otto Jespersen.
Wed. 9. Library Assistants' Association (University College, Gower Street), 3.30.—Address by the Right Hon. Herbert Lewis.
Geological, 5.30.—"Earthquake Waves and the Elasticity of the Earth," Dr. C. G. Knott.
Thurs. 10. Royal, 4.30.
University College, 5.30.—"Sex and Class Dialects," Professor Otto Jespersen.

DR. R. B. ORR'S Thirty-first Annual Archeological Report as Director of the Ontario Provincial Museum records the accession of 528 specimens to the collections during 1919, and describes and figures 32 of them, including many pipes, some of unusual pattern, a string of wampum, a fine stone axe, and several gorgets. Dr. Orr has, as usual, included in his report several original memoirs by himself and others. The longest and most important of these is an account of the Iroquois in Canada. The five nations, as they were formerly, have been the adhesion of the Tuscaroras. The rise of British influence with them was due to the justice with which they were treated. Their leader, Joseph Brant, obtained for them in 1784 a grant of the land on the banks of the Grand River which they still occupy. They were and have continued to be His Majesty's faithful allies. Some of them still retain their own laws for internal government, laws evolved in the Stone Age before the white man came. They volunteered readily to serve in the European war, and two of their number won the Victoria Cross. Dr. Orr has illustrated his memoir with pictures of their houses and council chambers and a portrait of Brant, and gives specimens of their folk-lore and an appreciation of their intellectual character.

The Berlin correspondent of The Times learns that a Chair has been created in Leyden for Professor Albert Einstein, the eminent physicist, whose theory of relativity is closely connected with the doctrine of the Leyden savant Professor G. H. Lorentz. Professor Einstein has undertaken to stay three weeks every year at Leyden University. These engagements, however, do not affect his other activities. He will remain a member of the Berlin Academy of Sciences, and will, in common with some other investigators, continue to conduct the Research Institute in Neu Eabusberg, which is to be founded and maintained by means of the Einstein Fund.

FINE ARTS ZOFFANY

By his new book on Zoffany, Dr. Williamson has deserved well of the Walpole Society and of his country. Lady Victoria Manners, by her laborious, intelligent, and successful effort, has given to the very numerous items constituting the life-work of the artist, has deserved well of Dr. Williamson. The partnership, thanks to the intervention of the manufacturer—Mr. John Lane, publisher of singular enterprise, endowed with artistic taste and knowledge—has produced a volume such as, in regard to superior to paper and print, to say nothing of the plates, has inrsembled been devoted to the honour of greater painters. In short, the work commands its own welcome; and the ghost of Zoffany should be a proud spirit this day.

As the biographer of a decade or so of the leading Little Masters of the British School, Dr. Williamson has taken a recognized place, aiming primarily at the quality of historian rather than of critic. His talent for collecting facts and details is prodigious, and his industry amazing. His object is to include every accessible thing, even though he strain the point of importance, and to omit nothing. By this method, Boswellian in its kind, he produces an atmosphere amid which persons, pictures, and events are seen in their proper element: they are steeped in the eighteenth century. He shows us the Jewish artist, by a change of name—a practice not uncommon in his race from Abraham and "Israel" downwards, and even upwards in the alteration of appellation applied to the Albrecht Dürer—emerging from the rather more euphonious Zoffany, and establishing himself quite naturally in the home-country of his choice; and we see him become an inevitable selection as a foundation-member of the Royal Academy when the new society was constituted in 1769. His claim to the distinction is illustrated in the reproductions given by the score in this sumptuous book, and its justification must be allowed without cavil. It is true that "tradition," or what goes for it in collectors' houses, has carried into the volume a number of works which clearly have no right there; but the author has prudently protected himself from reproach in his List of Works by the precautionary expression "By or attributed to," such as is used by all honest auctioneers' sale-catalogues. How, otherwise, could the young Zoffany be credited with the spirited portrait of "Mrs. Garrick in Her Youth," which surely can be by no other hand than Vanderbank's?—witness the whole arrangement and the handling of the brush in the draperies. How can many of these pictures be told from the work of Benjamin Wilson, his senior, of Philip Reinagle, his junior, and of certain others of his contemporaries, all devoted to the production of "conversation-pieces" and portraits à-la-moître? Even the portrait of three children, belonging to Mr. Cunliffe, for which Dr. Williamson expresses so warm an admiration—which it is hard for the present writer to share—might well be a group of heads, not very well drawn, by Russell. And there is more than a touch of the Neapolitan or Spanish School about "The Travelling Musicians." There are other canvases besides which by the author's comprehensive plan could not be refused inclusion, yet which seem to flout the authorship that family custom has ascribed. When experts habitually hesitate between Zoffany, Wilson, Philips, and the rest, how could any author claim to have untied the Gordian knot?
Walpole declared of Zoffany that "he is the Hogarth of Dutch painting." The epithet defies exact analysis, but it doubtless means that the artist painted Hogarthian conceptions in the Dutch manner; that is to say that the half-assimilated Englishman rendered his play-scenes of Garrick's interlude "The Farmer's Return from London." (1793). Bickerstaffe's comic opera, "Love in a Village" (in the same year), and Ben Johnson's "The Alchemist" (revived in 1757) much as a Dutchman might have done. That may be true; but as to the inspiration we need surely not go to the earlier, the more accomplished and refined masters, such as Gerard Dow, Van Mieris, Ter Borch, Metsu, and De Hooch, as is suggested by Dr. Williamson, but rather to Hogarth's contemporary Horremans, whose pictures in the manner of conversation-pieces have been sold in this country as Hogarth's. It certainly seems as if the travelled Zoffany, who was in fact a good deal of a cosmopolitan, was for a time not a little of a pasticheur, in like manner—but less deliberately and much less continuously—to Dietricij, who was but a few years his senior and like himself a native of Germany. But in his early pictures, such as the admirable "Dollond, the Optician," and "The Porter and the Hare"—more masterly far in characterization and illumination than in atmosphere—we feel less the influence of Chardin (the name suggested) than of the brothers Le Nain. Dr. Williamson properly names also Pietro Longhi and Gainsborough as the occasional inspirers of Zoffany, but when he adds Watteau, a concession may be asked in favour of Lancret. Sir Cuthbert Quilter had in his collection a beautiful tea-table scene which was always, by him and others, attributed to Hogarth, and he would not listen to the present writer's claim for Lancret, until the production of an engraving of the picture with the Frenchman's name as painter compelled conviction.

Zoffany's versatility as an artist proclaims itself vividly in these alluring pages. He is here as a portraitist, in life size and in little—his sitters always doing something, or thinking something. He is here as a sympathetic painter of landscape—only subordinate backgrounds, these and a little "operator" in feeling, but tenderly seen and skilfully accomplished. He appears as a painter of the interior of art-galleries, such as David Teniers, Gonzales Coques and their group and many followers produced, and he may be accorded the fore-front if we judge from the wonderful success with which the manner of the various originals is imitated. We have him as a painter of scenes selected from stage-plays, in which, it must be admitted, we have the smell of the foot-light lamps, in the elimination of which Hogarth, aiming at the natural, was usually so curiously successful; as a skilful painter of Indian subjects which, in spite of the artist's clever rendering of character, must appear to many as among the least interesting aspects of his art: yet he had the incentive of emulation, for Ozius Humphry and John Smart were also in India, the Eldorado which attracted as well Tilly Kettle, Daniell, Devis and other painters by the promise of rich reward. We have him, too, pre-eminently as a painter of still-life and costume, wherein he approaches near to the front rank, if we take his manner and his limitations into account.

Dr. Williamson insists that Zoffany had "no imagination." That depends upon what is here understood by imagination. If he means the divine afflatus, we agree; for Zoffany never touches upon poetry, and about his treatment of religious and allegorical subjects the less said the better. But if we consider imagination in a painter as the pictorial quality of arrangement, composition, variety, and invention—not only in groups and conversation-pieces, but even single portraits (in which the author thinks he is "not at his best")—we surely cannot deny him very considerable endowment.

In his single full-length portraits, curiously enough, Zoffany was far more successful with the heads than with the legs—the obtrusive white-stockinged limbs, usually crossed, wooden and lifeless, as they often are even in the case of Gainsborough; the stubborn fashion of stocking and there was too much for the very masters. We see it, for example, in the otherwise brilliant picture of old Andrew Drummond the Banker, admirable in its character and rendering of hale old age. When we come to the portrait of the Earl of Sandwich, elegant and refined, to the charm of Lady Caroline Hervey and the other members of her family, all still in the collection of the Earl of Bristol, to the pictures of Lady Mary FitzGerald and of Mrs. Oswald, and to the extraordinarily vivacious three-quarter-length of Gainsborough, belonging to Mr. Wertheimer, we must allow that there is individuality and grace galore, here set forth with accomplished technique and usually with sobriety of well-managed colour. In the groups we find imagination stimulating invention in remarkable measure. What could be more delightful in its intimacy than the family portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Palmer and their daughter, or more pleasing and original than the so-called "Sheridan and Mrs. Robinson"—who are seated in a gracious landscape strangely described as "a theatrical scene"?

It is not, however, by pictures such as these that Zoffany is, and will continue to be, remembered, but by those extraordinary agglomerations of persons and objects of art, such as "The Tribuna, Florence Gallery," "The Life-School of the Royal Academy," and "The Townley Marbles"—each in its own way absolutely pre-eminently, yet as art not worth, taken all together, "The Clandestine Marriage"—with its exquisite beauty of restrained colour, subtle and broken—or several groups set in landscapes or interiors. It cannot be denied that Zoffany's theatrical portraits and scenes constitute a pictorial history of the stage over a series of years which are often spoken of as comprising its golden age, but while such pictures, be they by Zoffany, or by De Wilde and others of their class, do give us the Stage, those of George Clint and his like represent the Drama. Therein lies Zoffany's weakness as well as his strength. This is made clear by the generous loan by the Garrick Club of a large group of the best Zoffany's belonging to that supreme collection, in which the "Garrick and Mrs. Pritchard in 'Macbeth" takes its place. But that is not the picture after which Valentine Green scraped his mezzotint in 1770—three years after Garrick's revival of the play for the benefit of Mrs. Pritchard, who died a few months afterwards. The original of it, showing variations all over, is now in the State Art Gallery of the Maharajah Gaekwar of Baroda. Both pictures are here reproduced.

The exposition of a hitherto accepted error in the date of Zoffany's birth is a novel point; but Dr. Williamson's attention may be drawn to the fact that the early engraved portrait bears an inscription in which the year "1773" has been clumsily altered by the engraver to "1733," the date given in the reference-books. We must now, therefore, understand that Zoffany was born not in 1723, as indicated on his headstone, but in 1725, wherefore, as the publisher states, he was "only 85 when he died." This brings to mind Sir Charles Gavan Duffy's remark to me on his 82nd birthday: "Ah, you know, when a man is 82 he is apt to be cut off in his prime."—M. H. SPIELMANN.

The Trustees of the Bowes Museum at Barnard Castle have deposited on loan at the National Gallery four most interesting works, which have just been placed on exhibition. Two of the pictures are Spanish; a striking "St. Peter," by El Greco, bearing the painter's curious signature; and a little "Prison Interior," by Goya, of singular power and simplicity. The other two pictures are Italian; a little panel by the rare Sienese painter Sassetti, and a sketch by Tiepolo.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

British Institute of Industrial Art. — Inaugural Exhibition.

Grafton Galleries. — Paintings and Drawings by Alexandre Jacovleff and others.

Little Art Rooms. — Etchings by S. Anderson, W. A. Narbeth, F. Potter and others.

The creation of the British Institute of Industrial Art is, or should be, an event of national importance. The Institute has been set up by the Boards of Trade and Education acting in conjunction for the purpose of establishing high standards in industrial art, and incidentally to fill the position of a semi-official clearing-house for registering progress. The function of the Institute is to link the artists who create standards of quality, by designs and plans and isolated specimens, and the manufacturers whose legitimate aim is cheapness secured by modern production. To this end the Director (Major A. A. Longden, D.S.O.) has established a Bureau of Information for the use of manufacturers and artists (which will also be available to the public and to visitors from abroad), and he has embarked on a programme of exhibitions, the first of which is now open at 217, Knightsbridge, S.W. 7 (Telephone Kensington 2729). The exhibitions, as things considered, is creditable and promising. There is evidence that the new institution has secured support from both sides, and this is in itself an achievement. For manufacturers and artists are temperamentally suspicious of one another. And the former have a naive and deep-rooted conviction that they have nothing to learn about their own business. The Institute, we imagine, found it especially difficult to persuade manufacturers of their error at the present moment, when, owing to the general shortage, they can dispose of all production—good or bad—with ease and considerable profit. Nevertheless, we have the impression that the manufacturers have cooperated with the Institute more effectively than the artists. Many of the trade exhibits are very good indeed. They range from costly objets de luxe such as luxuriantly designed and admirably executed oak and lime interior decorations in the style of Grinling Gibbons (H. H. Martyn & Co.) and sumptuous pile velvets (Warner & Co.) to simple modern oak furniture (Heal & Son) and stoneware (Carter, of Poole). The artists, on the other hand, show a tendency to follow the exponents of Morris-Crane Arts and Crafts tradition with its pseudo-medievalism and endless " argoses with portly sail," and the more recent and equally sterile tradition which derives from Vienna and Munich, and which made such strides here when we were at war with the countries of its origin. We noted a few excellent works sent by individual artists, but they are swamped by much that is merely pretty in colour, and neglects the fundamental aspect of durability.

M. Alexandre Jacovleff, a Russian artist who has worked a year or two in China and brought the results to London. This does not sound very encouraging on paper. It suggests the globe-trotting artist who, having failed to react to his normal surroundings, hopes, and usually hopes in vain, to react elsewhere; and it evokes the tiresome "picturesque bits" and "interesting types" which are usually produced under such conditions. There is, indeed, no evidence that M. Jacovleff was driven to China to develop any fixed convictions about art or any definite attitude towards life. But his work is nevertheless something more interesting than the average globe-trotter's notes. It is more on a level with the art of Zuloaga, who is a globe-trotter in his own country, presenting it as a stage set peopled exclusively by Montmartre figures and the characters in "Carmen." If M. Jacovleff goes to Spain in the next few years' time, when he has acquired more facility in the handling of oil-paint, he will probably give us much the same thing.

Mr. Stanley Anderson and Mr. W. A. Narbeth are showing some sincere and capableetchings at the Little Art Rooms. "Casual Labour" and "Paris Tenements" by the former, and "porter and Job at the Iron Gate" by the latter, are worth the attention of collectors. We do not, however, see anything more than trivial prettiness in Miss Madeline Green's aquarists.

Music

GENI SADERO

The collectors of folk-songs assure us that their tunes are still sung by the peasantry of England, so the statement must be accepted as true; but to hear them thus sung one must have a special instinct for disovery, like the people who possess the gift of seeing birds' nests. For practical purposes folk-songs are items in concert programmes, as far as England is concerned. The placing of songs from Italy is the fashion to-day in Italy; but there is another class of singers who sing them in costume as a semi-dramatic entertainment. Somehow or other, the result is as any case very seldom satisfactory.

When a result is unsatisfactory it frequently means that the agent does not know clearly what result he wishes to obtain, or, if he does know, does not know by what means he can obtain it best. What is the object of singing folk-songs at a concert? Most people sing them because they have heard some other singer sing them and have observed that they induced the audience to applaud, possibly to giggle as well. The besetting sin of English singers is to sing folk-songs as a distastefully kitschish archness. It must be intensely national characteristic; the Vauxhall and Spring Gardens ditties of the eighteenth century were evidently composed for singers of this type. Our singers sing folk-songs to exploit their own personality. It is quite a proper object; after all, for what other reason does anyone go to the expense of giving a recital? Our Irish singers lay on the brougue as thick as they can, sometimes even when they sing the classics, and the Scottish singers in like manner make the most of their native pronunciation. But there are hardly any English singers of English songs who ever succeed in giving one any sense of the soil. The best singer of folk-songs that I ever heard—I call him the best because, whatever his technical accomplishment was, he made the most vivid appeal to emotion—was an elderly gentleman, an amateur, who, at an evening party in a drawing-room sang without accompaniment, sitting in an armchair, and transported us by his utter simplicity and naturalness to where Yorkshire meets Westmorland. He moved us because by the pure art of singing and diction he was able to put the original singers of his songs before us, and he was able to do that because he had known those original singers and lived his life among them.

Signorina Geni Sadero, who gave a recital of Italian folk-songs last week, is a singer of the same power, with the added intensity of emotional force that comes from the South. Here in England we are easily tempted to think that Italian folk-music is represented by the songs composed for the Piedigrotta festival at Naples, of which "Santa Lucia" is a familiar example. Those who have gone further afield may perhaps know the Tuscan songs of Gordigiani or the Venetian songs of which I wrote recently. Such songs often seem very inferior in interest to our own. They have a wearisome monotony of rhythm and a commonplace vulgarity of outline; they seem to do little more than reiterate the alternate chords of tonic and dominant. It is possible to trace their ancestry to the songs of the Renaissance and the Middle Ages, to a period when the uneducated people seemed to show a more definite instinct for crude tonic and dominant harmony than the musicians who were learned in counterpoint. But there are in some parts of Italy folk-songs of a very different character. In Sardinia, in South Italy and Sicily there is a musical language which seems to have little connection with modern European music. It seems to date from far remoter times than those of the Renaissance and to have been influenced by the music perhaps of the Saracens, perhaps even of ancient Greece. In the course of centuries it has, one imagines, developed on its own lines, independently of the music of musicians. The composers of artistic music have seldom come in contact with it. It is hinted at occasionally in the Neapolitan comic operas of the eighteenth century, and Alessandro Scarlatti in one of his cantatas has left us a strange "aria alla Siciliana" which recalls the long-drawn wailing cry that the traveller in Italy, on hot, motionless days, would waft across the fields. To the Northerner accustomed to the clear-cut rhythms of English folk-songs, such melodies seem to belong to a world of which he has no cognizance.

It is these songs of the South, songs of toil, of suffering and of passion, that Signorina Sadero sings. She has learned them from the actual singers, sometimes on the spot, sometimes from the soldiers to whom she has sung in the Italian military hospitals. Listening to folk-songs of our own islands, one may be impressed by the positive musical beauty of the song; in some cases of folk-singers one may be indifferent to the song, but interested in the singer—interested perhaps artistically, perhaps otherwise. With Signorina Sadero, one often forgets the singer; she is a voice rather than a woman. One forgets the song too, at any rate as a work of art. If one steels one's heart against emotion and forces oneself to consider her critically, one can sometimes find fault with her harmonizations and accompaniments. They are not those of a scholar; if she hints at a period, she does not know how to reproduce it accurately; she jumbles together antique and modern, simple and elaborate, with a sometimes very disturbing result. As an accompanist her art is instinctive rather than calculated. As a singer, on the other hand, she is so accomplished in technique as to have passed far beyond the region of calculation. She is a complete mistress of vocal control, and, above all things, of vocal colour—so complete a mistress of them that she makes her audience forget all about them. It is simply the peasant that she brings before our eyes. When she sings those wild southern songs that to us seem to have neither rhythm nor tonality her instinctive sense of colour at the pianoforte is marvellously illuminating. It does not matter how queer her chords and modulations are; they are the right background for those strange and haunting melodies. Sometimes they are interspersed with vague shouts and cries, spoken words and the primitive noises with which a man talks to his horse or other animals. They start in one key and end in another: in one of her Venetian airs, for instance, she often has to raise, or lower, a semitone, a higher. Mr. Whittaker has done the same thing, by the way, in one of his Northumbrian songs. To describe Signorina Sadero's singing is impossible; one must hear her herself. Her songs are unpublished, and if they were published I cannot imagine anyone else singing them in the same way. There is a small collection of Sicilian songs edited by Alberto Favara (Ricordi) which contains songs very similar to hers; but to a Northern musician their intention is hardly intelligible until one has heard them sung by those who belong to the country. They are the expression of overwhelming emotional experiences, and the emotional element predominates in them over all others. There are few singers in concert-rooms who possess this emotional sense; those who do seldom have the technical skill to make full use of it. Signorina Sadero possesses both and something more—a singular personality that can at the same time appear to affect itself completely in the complete realization of each character which she presents. Her songs can teach us more about the psychology of Southern Italy than any guide-book or political treatise.

EDWARD J. DENT.

COVENANT GARDEN: "LOUISE"

The success of Puccini, an Italian critic once remarked, was due to the fact that in "La Bohème" he put the middle classes on the operatic stage. Verdi, however crude and vulgar his music might be, did at least deal with more or less heroic personalities and heroic emotions. He came down to modern life in "La Traviata," but the atmosphere of "La Traviata," is more distantly related to that of "La Bohème." It is in many ways sentimental and unreal. Musically it shows much more refinement of style than the other early operas of Verdi, and certainly far more refinement than any opera of Puccini. The libretto, too, shows a certain refinement of thought. It takes a commonplace story and eliminates its commonplace details, leaving only those emotions which make it suitable for an opera. Puccini's librettist starts with a deliberately romantic and unreal atmosphere, and makes every effort to concentrate attention on its commonplace details. That was what attracted his audiences. Every shopgirl in the gallery could think herself a second Minnie. Four years later (1900) Charpentier produced "Louise." Like "La Traviata," and "La Bohème," it is a presentation of "quel popoloso deserto che appallona Parigi"—that operatic Paris which is about as real as Chopin's Poland. "Louise" is a much more sincere work than "La Bohème," though in its construction Charpentier evidently owed a good deal to Puccini. Considered as music it is of little value. Its diluted Wagnerisms sound somewhat ridiculous in these days. The other night, when Mr. Coates conducted it, it sounded more Wagnerian than ever. Yet it is a singularly effective stage work. There are opportunities for acting in "La Bohème," but only those subordinate moments when the stage is occupied with unnecessary details. In "Louise" there is a real play, which must and can be acted all the time, except at very few points where something might be cut out altogether except for the moment of the Mother's appearance at the end. Till she comes in it is mere opera, almost oratorio. Its only justification lies in its contrast with the preceding acts and in its invocation to Paris, which in intention, if not in execution, lifts it on to a more poetical plane. The novelty and charm of "Louise" lay in its combination of naturalistic acting with the evocation of Wagnerian emotions. To-day its Wagnerism rings hollow and false; "Pelleas et Melisande" has shown us a more poignant emotional power expressed with fewer notes and less rhetoric. If Charpentier had tried his experiment on a smaller scale, if he had made his opera shorter and treated the whole story with more reticence and less exuberance of detail, it would to modern ears have sounded less old-fashioned and less conventionally operatic. Its most convincing moments are those which are quietest and most restrained.

CONCERTS

Miss Anna Case, an American soprano, who gave a recital at the Queen's Hall on May 29, has a small but well-trained voice of extended compass, and a remarkably clear enunciation. She was at her best in an aria of Bellini; she sings florid music with some fluency, though not with that appearance of ease which is essential to the florid style. She has the worst faults of the conventional oratorio singer, pausing on high notes regardless of the rhythm of a phrase. Her taste in modern songs is deplorable, and her temperament on the platform wanting in restraint and dignity. It was a pity to see great natural gifts and abilities so wasted.

The last Philharmonic concert took place on May 29. Mr. Landon Ronald gave an excellent performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture, Delibes's "Fêtes," and Schubert's C major Symphony. Mr. William Murdoch infused a certain charm into that otherwise very uninteresting work.
Scrinian's Concerto in F sharp minor; and Miss Carmen Hill sang a setting of Shelley's words "My Soul is an Enchanted Boat," by Miss Katharine Eggars. This last work would be more suited to a chamber concert, as it is accompanied only by pianoforte and string quartet. In more intimate surroundings it might be more effective; in the Queen's Hall its atmosphere of quiet refinement was not entirely suited to the gloomy colourings.

At a casual smoking concert one would have hailed Mr. John van Zyl as a singer with the promise of a successful career. He is at present hardly finished artist enough to undertake a whole programme alone. His diction is very uncertain, his pronunciation of Italian far from perfect, and his vocal production uneven. But he has a voice, and sings with a very attractive geniality of manner. If he will not content himself with these advantages alone, but will devote himself to the serious study both of singing and of music, he has the chance of developing into a really fine singer.

Two Manchester musicians, Mr. Carl Fuchs and Mr. Edward Isaacs, gave an interesting concert of music for violoncello and pianoforte on May 28. Mr. Fuchs produces a powerful but rather harsh tone from the violoncello, and was often disagreeably out of tune, but for all that he is a player to whom one listens with serious interest for the sake of that maturity and intelligence of phrasing which only comes from many years of practice in a severely classical school of music. He was well suited in Frank Bridge's Sonata in D, which was played by both musicians with breadth and emotional resonance. A suite by Reger for violoncello alone, played for the first time in England, showed little originality or interest. It is very obviously modelled on the suites of Bach, but its imitation of Bach is merely superficial and it more often degenerates into a pseudo-classical sentimentality. Nor is it well written for the solo instrument, for it sounded peremptory as if it ought to have had a pianoforte accompaniment. The missing harmonies were so obvious that the dullest imagination could easily supply them. That is not Bach's way of writing for solo violoncello; his music always sounds complete, and to add a pianoforte accompaniment would be an impertinence. Mr. Isaacs played the pianoforte in an aggressively efficient style.

On May 29 Mr. Lamond and Mr. Bronislaw Huberman played four of Beethoven's sonatas for pianoforte and violin to a disappointingly small audience. Chamber music of this intimate character—and the first sonata played, that in G, op. 96, is particularly intimate in style—is not very well suited to the Queen's Hall. Mr. Huberman is a worthy partner for Mr. Lamond in the interpretation of Beethoven. They played the early sonatas in E flat and D with a beautifully balanced animation that made them seem eternally fresh and young in spite of their old-fashioned idiom. They even solved what is one of the most difficult problems of early Beethoven violin sonatas, the treatment of those passages where the pianoforte and violin melody overlap the accompaniment; Mr. Huberman played them with a curious shadowy caress that transformed their commonplace figures into a subtle suggestion of harmonic colour. It was one of those rare concerts which bring real rest and refreshment of spirit to weary minds.

As unusually interesting concert was given by the Misses May, Beatrice and Margaret Harrison at the Wigmore Hall on May 27 when second performances were given of the two new concertos—that of Delius for violin and violoncello, and that of Elgar for violoncello alone. One is very glad to have had these two works put through the test of a performance with pianoforte accompaniment, for in both cases the orchestral construction is treated with such unusual care that they seem by sufficiently restrained than do most of the others through such a reduction. Both of them, however, came through very well, especially the Delius, which confirms one's first impression of a clearer thematic definition and greater structural cohesion than one usually gets from this composer. In the Elgar one got a deepening conviction of both what is good and what is bad in the work, and the latter colourations are things here and there that are rank bad. On the whole, one might say that about sixty-five per cent. of it is really good Elgar. The piano score was in the hands of Mr. York Bowen, who was also heard in a group of his own rather superficial compositions.

Once or twice while playing the part of Jean de la Fontaine, M. Sacha Guiry provoked outbursts of applause from the frenzied rapidity with which he hurled out his more impassioned speeches. It was certainly exhilarating to listen to, but it did not leave any deep mark on the memory, and what is true of these scenes is true in a measure of the whole play. "Jean de la Fontaine" slips past agreeably and gracefully with its songs and jests, its philosophies and epigrams, its miracles and quarrels, its reconciliations and love-making, but it dissolves on the curtain-fall with the fragility of a dream, and it is hard to remember what it was all about.

It may be that M. Guiry's structureless biographical dramas (the term "biographical" may be taken in both its senses) need a character of the strength and weight of Pasteur's to hold them together and stamp them on the mind. La Fontaine in spite of his bulk and his rhenmatism is, after all, only a butterfly. Elusive and capricious, he flutters through the four acts without course or purpose. He pauses an instant at every fair flower; the wings of his wit flash, and he is gone. No one is the better and no one a penny the worse. His wife cannot keep him—of course not. He is off through the window, and would have gone just the same if she had never flirted with a military man. The lovely little singer who visits him through a hole in the wall of his Paris lodging finds that circling restlessly round an epigram when he should be adoring her voice, and elopes in a pet with her music-master. Luli. Mme. de la Sablere—are, we are rather ashamed of his dealings with this ripe and wealthy beauty. There is too much of Skimpole's naive cunning in the way he gets her to support him. But we know that he will be off once more as soon as the window opens. The fan of Ninon de Lenclos herself cannot be twirled deftly enough to crush him. Another wide circle, and with a rapturous sense of forbidden fruit, he is embracing his own wife again, delighted to punish that truant husband of hers. It is all a series of Euclidean points without parts or magnitude. It has nothing to do with Ia Fontaine or his age; for its secret relations are not between the words in the epigrams. It gives M. Guiry a great deal, and Mlle. Printemps, who plays the fugitive rossignol, far too little to do, and allows Mlle. Beylat as Mme. de la Fontaine to shine with the brilliance and hardness of a diamond. It is all played swiftly, lightly and masterfully; it goes out like the flame of a candle and is forgotten.

"L'Illusioniste" is much the same story. It is firmer in outline, however, and, in virtue of its modernity, less dreamlike and fantastic. The conjurer's turn at the music-hall and his dressing-room with the posters and electric lamps at the make-up table are as real as can be. M. Guiry, too, is realistic. His hair, his clothes, his manners, his partner and his bows are all closely and successfully studied. And they are all, of course, a trick, to carry off the incredible adventures of the later scenes. For if the opening is observation of life, the end is pure Guiry, Guiry at its best, and played by its creator more lightly and surely than he has played anything so far during the season.

The sketch (for it is really little more) consists of two episodes, loosely stitched together. "Teddy Brookes," the conjurer, can only, it seems, speak a little bad French during his turn. "Miss Hopkins" sings English songs, and speaks it, seems, no French at all. When they meet behind the scenes they ought to have a great many notes to compare. But they are both strangely tongue-tied. Then it comes out that "Brookes" is Paul Dufresne, who can imitate an Englishman's French accent and no more, and that "Miss Hopkins" is from Montmartre, and has never understood a word of the songs she sings. The unravelling of this little complication, when it is done by M. Sacha Guitry and Milie Printemps, is infinitely more amusing than it looks on paper.

Now there enters a disturbing factor, and with it the Guitry philosophy. Jacqueline is a stately and inflammatory beauty who has been watching Paul's show from a box with her "friend" Albert. She comes round with Albert to the dressing-room just as Paul is discovering the language in which to make love to his little singer, and invites the conjourer to give a private séance at her flat. Paul knows what the invitation means, and, prosaic and practical mummer as he is, he reacts to it, precisely as the butterfly poet of the other comedy would have done.

He leaves poor Miss Hopkins in the lurch and is off. Jacqueline has got rid of Albert and his party by a piece of studied rudeness, and when Paul arrives he finds her alone. He and she go off to fly with him round the world and paint a glorious picture. Jacqueline never serves her turn at night, but the next morning there are other things to think of, including Miss Hopkins's plaintive voice at the end of the telephone. Would he ask a woman like Jacqueline to rough it with him all over the globe, and share the toils and stresses of his homeless existence? Of course not, as he tactfully explains. So he leaves her, resigned but fearful, and the curtain closes down in true Guitry fashion on the return of the simple-minded Albert, who begs his mistress to weep no more as her rudeness to him last night is quite, quite forgiven and forgotten. With M. Leitner to work up the part of poor Albert into a delicious character-study and Milie Beylat to make Jacqueline everything that is dangerous and fascinating, this second episode is as good as the first. It is one pint of champagne freshly opened after another.

As author, actor and producer alike, M. Guitry has on this occasion earned the eulogies of the gentleman who writes his English programmes for him.

Dramas and Disguises

We did not find the "Mystery of the Yellow Room," as baffling as better critics seem to have found its long induction to melodrama has made us observant of small signs: we use our opera-glass a Mr. Holmes, of Baker Street, did his lens. Thus when a lady says that she is sure her dead husband is really alive and watching her, it may be, at this moment, we quickly rake the stage for a gentleman in a cloak in the background. And if we see him, we deduce all the other acts in a flash. Hence when Mathilde Stangerson did say something of the kind, and Frederic Larsen did appear between two pillars, we knew that he was not, as he pretended, an Inspector of the Sûreté, but Mathilde's criminal husband disguised. Nor could we escape us after that by any tricks. He might sit down in an armchair with the white hair of Mathilde's father, and spring up with the moustaches and imperial of Mephistopheles or a chief of the cannon; he might while struggling hand-to-hand with his wife's lover get rid of beard and moustaches and become the detective again: we knew (or ought to have known) that he was the same villain all the time. And really Mr. Franklin Dyall made him such a capable and dignified and agreeable sort of a person that we were very sorry when he shot himself.

Could not the smart young journalist Rouletabille, when he discovered that this man was his own father, have persuaded him to give up the disguise-habit and reform? Mr. Arthur Pusey made Joseph such a remarkably engaging "juvenile" that it seemed a pity the two should not understand each other. They might even have combined to kill some of the other characters without estranging our sympathies. As for Miss Sybil Thornton, we were sorry to find her in the business at all. By flinging all her excellent sound and tragic power into the part of Mathilde, she simply gave the impression of over-acting. It was not her fault, but the author's.

The "Yellow Cockade" is more naïve. The disguises there create no puzzles. King's officers become highwaymen for honourable purposes, and ladies dress as gallants, for no dishonourable ones. The glamour of the "Bath road" and of High Tobydom generally covers a good deal, even the violation of the first rule of romantic drama that the hero must be Jacobite and the villains Hanoverians. We can stand with a smothered laugh the spectacle of George II. evoking loyalty and passionate devotion, but we really cannot stand a hero who does not know how to fight. Monsieur Beaucache allowed himself to be pinned after some delay by Captain Hubert Langton down like a heavy-weight boxing champion in the first round, even though his second is in the ring defending him. So we grudge him his Lady Betty, who, as represented by Miss Dorothy Hanson, certainly seemed a person worth fighting for, both in her fall-fals and as a graceful boy in breeches and riding coat. She could afford, all the same, to put a little more vigour into the part. Because she looks as dainty as Dresden china, there is no reason to act as if she were as brittle.

"All's Well That Ends Well" at Bayswater

Shakespeare could easily afford to shoulder all responsibility for the inconsistencies of presentation which usually result from the attempt to interpret on the stage his leastactable plays, but it would be less easy to thrust such responsibility upon him. There are moments in "All's Well That Ends Well" when Helena suddenly becomes a different woman, no longer driven here and there by misfortune, a plaintive and helpless bird in the tossing storm; she takes to herself, as did Boccaccio's Giletta de Narbonne, a swift domination of the whole position. The change is by no means accidental, nor is it one of character, but of expression. It is because Helena has her counterpart in Hamlet that an actress undertaking the rôle must of necessity regard the variation as deliberate, inarticulate to ignore.

The unrelieved humility of Miss Irene Clarke's performance has made curiously devoid of humour the vocal recitals of the comedy at Mr. William Poel's School of Dramatic Art in the Ethical Church, Bayswater. The somnolence of the Elizabethan stage-setting had a share also in robbing the afternoon of an essential briskness. The audience found it difficult to accustom itself to the persistent (and un-Elizabethan) half-lights, but there were decided compensations, such as the amazingly beautiful scenes by candlelight between Helena, the widow, and the girl Diana—Miss Iris Parker's portrayal of Diana being one of the most pleasing successes in a uniformly excellent performance. It was a pleasure to find Miss Florence Henderson adapting herself to both quiet dignity and success to the part of the Countess.

The only problem which one might say Mr. Poel has still to solve in his adaptation of the modern theatre to Elizabethan times is that of the suitable retirement of a character from the scene of action. To step on to the stage from the auditorium the absence of the customary "wings" seemed easy and natural enough, but to divest oneself absolutely of histrionic importance at a given moment in full view of the audience is a different matter.

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—I cannot pretend to do justice to the subject, but, if I may, I will try to meet the direct questions aimed at me in last week’s Athenæum.

The question of craftsmanship implies objective art is surely vital. I assumed lyricism to be subjective because by lyricism I meant passionate self-expression in art. I would not venture to assert that Beethoven’s Ninth Symphony (for example) was or was not autobiographical. But if a musical critic could tell me that it was lyrical in this sense with as much certainty as those with which I could tell him Shelley’s “Prometheus Unbound” was lyrical, then I would say that Beethoven was not among the masters, the very greatest, as a type. He may have been a master of his medium of expression. Lyricism in music (or any art), however, awakens chords deep buried in the soul of man, not because it expresses the artist’s individuality, but because it expresses the artist’s intuitive perception of ideal truth. Objective art fulfills the same function. The objective artist is greater than the subjective artist because of range of experience, not technique, is the final test of stature. Masterly technique is required by both. It is not technique that makes Bach greater than Schumann, Shakespeare greater than Swinburne.

The reply to Mr. Johnson’s question, Can any music be great music “that has not an uplifting moral effect upon an audience”? is that it depends upon the audience. No great music could fail to increase the well-being (moral goodness) of an audience capable of aesthetic appreciation. But such a “moral significance” depends upon the beauty being perceived, and no moral considerations can enter into the judgment which recognizes beauty. It only needed to be stated logically to become obvious. This Kant did.

Yours sincerely,

R. L. Mégroz.

BEETHOVEN’S SONATAS
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—May I be allowed a word of protest against Mr. Dent’s description of the “five most abstruse” of Beethoven’s sonatas, played by Mr. Lamond at Queen’s Hall some days ago, as the “greatest of all music” (Athenæum, May 14, p. 646)?

Apart from the point as to whether music that is totally unsuited to the instrument for which it is written can be termed “great,” Beethoven’s finest work was done undoubtedly in his so-called “middle” period—the time that produced the “Waldstein” Sonata. Even the enthusiasts admit that the later sonatas are spoiled by obscurities that no clarity of interpretation can abolish. They are in the thought behind the music, and cannot be remedied.

Yours, etc.,

MR. SYMONS AND PLAGIARISM
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—In a recent number of The Athenæum a correspondent drew attention to a piece (in the form of a book) of gross and vulgar plagiarism of some of the work of Mr. Arthur Symons; but it is with consternation that I, a great admirer of Mr. Symons’ genius, note that in his marvellous essay on Leonardo da Vinci, in the current issue of the Fortnightly Review, he himself has twice, or perhaps more times, overstated the limit in that direct manner (I believe it be intentional) (we remember Wilde’s bon mot on the subject) or whether it be a mere trick of the swiftness of the mind over the pen, I know not, but surely “... he being the least of all men to whom there could be anything poisonous in the exotic flowers of evil that germinated in Milan,” and “Of the lapping wall of the retort oozing with mineral salts he painted ‘The Last Supper,’” is rather too much like Pater’s “To Leonardo least of all men could there be anything poisonous in the exotic flowers of sentiment that grew there,” and the other sentence of exactly the same texture as the latter one of Mr. Symons.

But this only serves to remind one of Mr. Symons seeing one of the daughters of Herodias in one of his poems as trembling like a young tree in the wind, whereupon one at once thinks of Wilde’s Salome trembling like a narcissus. When we consider that the “narcissus” (as I believe was his wont) from some vague decadent French poet, we do not wonder at someone (I think Plato) observing that all, right from the world’s beginning, is plagiarism. But whether it is a brain’s trick—as I am inclined to think it is—Mr. Symons surely can be excused, and incidentally perhaps Oscar Wilde, from copying such gorgeous images.

Faithfully yours.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Owing to the wonderfull unanimity of the reviewers’ opinions of “The Vanity Girl,” I read the book with more than ordinary attention to convince myself whether or not Mr. Mackenzie was as a snob and writing in the “Poor Relations” vein, but less farcical, and more in the comedy spirit. He made a list of the necessary incidents: chorus-girl life, slight seduction interest, marriage with a peer, sweetness of chorus-girl, side, softening of heart of the aristocratic family, gambling, racing and the Derby. stronger seduction interest with a sinister touch of Jewish finance, and finally a hero’s death in the war. I think that up to the moment of Dorothy’s marriage the book succeeds in being good satire, with its points not too obviously stressed. Unfortunately, in writing Mr. Mackenzie falls in love with his heroine, and fails to maintain a satirical attitude towards her; still more unfortunately, he continues to bring in the incidents from his list, and they do not fit in with a lovable Dorothy.

There is yet another way of looking at “The Vanity Girl” —as a part of an enormous canvas of the Michael group. How does she fit into the composition? Have we got anything like the whole picture yet? Is it to be a second Comédie Humaine? The answers to these questions are beyond me.

Yours faithfully,

R. A. Allen.

THE LORD HARRY
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—I think that the review of Mr. Mowat’s book on Henry V. which appeared in The Athenæum of May 21 calls for a mild protest. I say “mild” because I do not wish your reviewer to be discouraged from a further exhibition of his undoubtedly exuberant paradox. I seem to remember that he has thrilled us on other fields by deeds of daring, but here he is tilting against the ascertained fact.

I pass over his reference to the “grey austerity of Gothic,” although we are taught to picture the medieval cathedral in a setting of gorgeous brilliance; and I ask whether the Sainte Chapelle, which was begun by St. Louis in 1241, and represents the mature Gothic idea, can really be called a “strange flower of medieval decadence.” And is “rococo” —poor term, so convenient and so ill-used!—quite the not juste to be joined to the “constructions of the Flamboyant manner” of the fifteenth century? The remainder of your reviewer’s remarks I leave to Mr. Mowat and Professor Oman. I am not competent to say what truth there may be in the chorus of praises with which his contemporaries (among them Xenus Sylvius) honoured King Henry, but I am not aware that the solemn and judicious summarising of his character by Bishop Stubbs is much in need of revision.

Yours, etc.

F. J. E. R.
THE Princesses of the Court of Louis XIV. form an interesting group, what with his cousin, La Grande Mademoiselle, eccentric and magnificent, and the two wives of his effeminate brother Monsieur; the charming and tragic little flirt, Madame Henriette, and the horsey Bavarian lady, whose downright correspondence is in refreshing contrast with the flummery fashionable at the time. Later on there came the kittenish Duchesse de Bourgogne, who sat on Mme. de Maintenon’s knee, and those riotous young women, the daughters of the Regent. They all had character, some too much of it. M. Collas, however, concerns himself with none of these, but with the prim Princess, another Bavarian, who became the wife of the Dauphin, commonly but incorrectly known as Monsieur— Why do they make a Cardinal of my son?" asked the King—the browbeaten man who, except when he could get away to his military duties, took refuge in wolf-hunting, fancy-dress balls and silence, "cessabore," as Saint-Simon puts it, "dans sa grasse et dans ses ténèbres." Was it worth while?

Yes, because the book enlarges our sympathies. We pity midinettes, bank clerks and even circus ponies, but their servitude is as nothing compared with a princess’s of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The marriage was, of course, political, designed to keep Bavaria steady to French interests, wherein, by the way, it signalied. Colbert de Croissy, Colbert’s brother, accordingly arrived at Munich, and ran his eye over the girl just as if she had been a filly up for sale at Tattersall’s. There was no getting away from it, he reported to Louis XIV., that she was plain; her nose was a little too thick at the end, and he rather thought that her arms were not as white as her throat. But she had good manners; she expressed herself with propriety; she would do. So she started for Paris, and on the way, when some courtiers tried to address her in German, she replied that French was thenceforth her only language. Years afterwards, as a bride, Marie Antoinette said precisely the same thing at Strasburg. Were these, M. Collas wonders, rehearsed performances? Probably they were, because German Princesses received a thorough training in their duties, and it will be remembered that when Lord Malmesbury was confronted by one of them of the Miss Heyden type in Princess Caroline of Brunswick, his injunctions included petitceux. Certain faults had to be corrected, and they were. She was too pious; her Angeluses, Mme. de Sévigné surmised, would have to be curtailed. She did not care for hunting or cards; she preferred conversation and work in her own room. That naturally could not be tolerated, since she must play her part in those high mysteries, including "donner la main," "monter dans carrosse," "le tabouret," and the rest of it, which were to the courtiers, notably to Saint-Simon, as the breath of their nostrils.

The Dauphine did her best, though her accent left something to be desired—she addressed her husband as "Monsieur," and French manners were never quite assimilated by her. After the death of the neglected little Queen she held the circle of court ladies. In her serious way she tried to talk politics, and when that topic was imperiously suppressed she obediently turned the conversation to chaffions. Once, and once only, her German prejudices got the upper hand. When the imperable Dangeau married Mlle. Lœwenstein, a poor relation, as it were, of the Bavarian house, and the priest called the bride "Sophie de Bavière," the Dauphine was so angry that it took three visits from Louis to appease her. Otherwise her one aim was to "plaire au Roy." Unfortunately the Dauphine had a signal defect: she was frequently ill. The court progresses, with fighting conveniently out of sight, which the Great Monarch regarded as his campaigns, tired her out; she had to get out of bed and dance, whether she liked it or not, or to receive the Siamese ambassadors, who duly recited speeches prepared for them by erudite Abbés. So the King grew cold to her, and Monsieur took to mistresses, though Mme. de la Fayette, no mean authority, declared that he went no farther than ogling. The Dauphine, of course, acquiesced; and when Louis XIV., who had been shepherded by Mme. de Maintenon into his second, and somewhat Tartuffian, manner, interposed and effected the famous "rupture" of the ladies of honour, or, as and say nowadays, "sacked the lot," his daughter-in-law’s chief preoccupation was lest new spites should be set about her by that dread lady. Shutting herself up with her only friend, Mlle. Bezzola, a companion of the Munich days, she nursed her increasing illnesses, while the courtiers declared that she shammed. "Il faura que je meure," she exclaimed, "pour que l'on me croie malade."

And die the Dauphine did, at the early age of twenty-nine, after quacks had crammed her with drugs that made her much worse, and doctors had bled her after the precepts set forth in "Le Malade Imaginaire" and practised by Doctor Sangrado. After all, she had played her part. She had been the mother of Louis XV., and it was not her fault that the pious and able young Duc de Bourgogne, the pupil of Fenelon and idol of Saint-Simon, went to the grave before his magnificent grandfather. That personage was ready with a pompous platitud; he reminded Monsieur that they both must die, and, "Vous voyez ce que deviennent les grands de ce monde." The King personally supervised the funeral ceremonies, and very splendid they were; he hunted during the interval before the burial, since etiquette so permitted, but refrained from cards, which were not "de deuil." Could he come back to us, what a "producer" he would make at the Alhambra or the Hippodrome! As for his victim, her fate remained one of those cases of which the jury, after some hesitation, swallowed their suspicions and return a verdict of death from natural causes. In her will the Dauphine declared that she left nothing to the King, because "tout est à lui," including, as it happened, her life.

OUT OF RANGE

Livilu. Par Romain Rolland. (Paris, Ollendorff, 6fr.)

M. Romain Rolland is a great provincial. "Jean Christophe," with its lengths and its naivets and its flashes of genius, is essentially the work of an extra-metropolitan mind, of a man who looked up towards a world which he despised. In the rôle of the inspired country cousin M. Rolland was convincing; as the good European he somehow misses fire. From an Alpine retreat the war may indeed have appeared an absurd and tragic comedy of errors; Livilu, each man’s illusion, may have seemed nothing but a cunning and vulgar harlot. Nevertheless, to the solier, on the plain Livilu was something less obvious. Mr. Rolland, from his new elevation, saw the gestures of her silhouette, but he saw no faults of a corner’s request at which the jury, after some hesitation, swallowed their suspicions and return a verdict of death from natural causes. In her will the Dauphine declared that she left nothing to the King, because "tout est à lui," including, as it happened, her life.

LITERATURE AND PRESENT-DAY RUSSIA

Translated by S. Kotiansky.

The following is a translation of Maxim Gorky’s preface to the first catalogue of the great publishing house lately founded by him, under the name of “Government,” for the dissemination of the masterpieces of “World Literature,” which is, indeed, the name of the organization itself. Nothing could be more characteristic of Gorky’s noble idealism than this preface; it is, moreover, a document of the first importance, appearing as it does at a time when the necessity of renewing intellectual relations with Russia is felt to be increasingly urgent. The unbridled enthusiasm with which it is, we believe, the greatest schemes of popular literary education ever conceived, not in Russia only, but in the whole civilized world.—Ed.

Is it necessary to speak of the necessity of a serious study of literature, or at least of a wide acquaintance with it? Literature is the heart of the world, winged with all its joys and sorrows, with all the dreams and hopes of men, with their despair and wrath, with their reverence before the beauty of nature, their fears in face of her mysteries. This heart throbs violently and eternally with the thirst of self-knowledge, as though in it all those substances and forces of nature that have created the human personality as the highest expression of their complexity and wisdom aspired to clarify the secret and meaning of life.

Literature may also be called the all-seeing eye of the world, whose glance penetrates into the deepest recesses of the human spirit. A book—so simple a thing and so familiar—is, essentially, one of the great and mysterious wonders of the world. Someone unknown to us, sometimes speaking an incomprehensible language, hundreds of miles away, has drawn on paper various combinations of a score or so of signs, which we call letters, and when we look at them, we strangers, remote from the creator of the book, mysteriously perceive the meaning of all the words, the ideas, the feelings, the images; we admire the description of the scenes of nature, take delight in the beautiful rhythm of speech, the music of the words. Moved to tears, angry, dreaming, sometimes laughing over the motley printed sheets, we grasp the life of the spirit, akin or foreign to ourselves. The book is, perhaps, the most complicated and mightiest of all the miracles created by man on his path to the happiness and power of the future.

There is no book in the library, for there is yet no language common to all, but all literary creation, in prose and poetry, is saturated with the unity of feelings, thoughts, ideals shared by all men, with the unity of man’s sacred aspiration towards the joy of the freedom of the spirit, with the unity of man’s disgust at the miseries of life, the unity of his love, the possibility of higher attainments of life, outlined in the universal thirst for something indefinable in word or thought, hardly to be grasped by feeling, that mysterious something to which we give the pale name of beauty, and which comes to an ever brighter and more joyous flower in the world, in our own hearts.

Whatever may be the inward differences of nations, races, individuals, however distinct may be the external forms of states, religious conceptions and customs, however irreconcilable the conflict of classes—over all these differences, created by ourselves through centuries, hovers the dark and menacing spectre of the universal consciousness of the tragic quality of life and the poignant sense of the loneliness of man in the world.

Rising from the mystery of birth, we plunge into the mystery of death. Together with our planet we have been thrown into incomprehensible space. We call it the Universe, but we have no precise conception of it, and our loneliness in it has such an awful perfection that we have nothing with which to compare it.

The loneliness of man in the Universe and on the earth, which is to many a “desert, alas! not unpeopled”—on earth amid the most tormenting contradiction of desires and possibilities—was realized only by few. But the faint feeling of it is imprinted in the breast of nearly every man like a nocuous weed, and it often poisons the lives of men who appear to be perfectly immune from that murderous nostalgia which is the same for all ages and peoples, which tormented equally Byron the Englishman, Leopardi the Italian, the writer of “Ecclesiastes,” and Lao-Tse, the great sage of Asia.

This anguish that arises from the dim sense of the precariousness and tragedy of life is common to great and small, to everyone who has the courage to look at life with open eyes. And if a time is to come when men will have overcome this anguish and stifled in themselves the consciousness of the tragedy and loneliness of life, they will achieve that victory only by the way of spiritual creation, only by the combined efforts of literature and science.

Besides its envelope of air and light all our earth is surrounded with a sphere of spiritual creativeness, with the multiform rainbow emanation of our energy, which is, it seems, that part of which we have eliminated or forgone or which, in the future, will be called the most beautiful; out of which are created the mightiest ideas and the enchanting complexity of our machines, the amazing temples and tunnels that pierce the rock of great mountains, books, pictures, poems, millions of tons of iron flung as bridges across wide rivers, suspended with such miraculous lightness in the air—all the stern and lovely, all the mighty and tender poetry of our life.

By the victory of the mind and will over the elements of nature and the animal in man, striking out ever brighter sparks of hope from the iron wall of the unknown, we men can speak with legitimate joy of the planetary significance of the great efflorescences of our spirit, most resplendently and powerfully expressed in literary and scientific creation.

The great virtue of literature is that by deepening our consciousness of the condition of life, by giving shape to our feelings, it speaks to us as with a voice saying: All ideals and acts, all the world of the spirit is created out of the blood and nerves of men. It tells us that Hen-Toy, the Chinaman, is as agonizingly unsatisfied with the love of woman as Don Juan, the Spaniard; that the Abyssinian sings the same songs of the sorrows and joys of love as the Frenchman; that there is an equal pathos in the love of a Japanese Geisha and Manon Lescaut; that man’s longing to find in woman the other half of his soul has burned and burns with an equal flame men of all lands, at times.

A murderer in Asia is as loathsome as in Europe; the Russian miser Plushkin is as pitiable as the French Grandet; the Tartufes of all countries are alike, Misanthropes are equally miserable everywhere, and everywhere everyone is equally charmed by the touching image of Don Quixote, the Knight of the Spirit. And after all, all men, in all languages, always speak of the same things, of themselves and their fate. Men and no instincts are everywhere alike, the world of the intellect alone is infinitely varied.

With a clearness irresistibly convincing, fine literature gives us all these innumerable likenesses and infinite varieties—literature, the pulsing mirror of life, reflecting with quiet sadness or with anger, with the kindly laugh of a Dickens or the frightful grimace of a Dostoevsky, the universal rhythm of speech, the music of the words, the collective and individual emotions and sentiments of life, the whole world of our desires, the bottomless stagnant pools of banality and folly, our heroism and cowardice in the face of destiny, the courage of love and the strength of hatred, all the naivete of our hypocrisy and the shameful abundance of lies, the disgusting stagnation of our minds and our endless anxieties, our thrilling hopes and sacred dreams—by which the world lives, all that quivers in the hearts of men. Watching man with the eyes of a sensitive friend, or with the stern glance of a judge, sympathizing with him, laughing at him, admiring his courage, cursing his nullity—literature rises above life, and, together with science, lights up for men the roads to the accomplishment of their goals, to the development of what is good in them and in the world.

At times enchanted with the beautiful aloofness of science, literature may become infatuated with a dogma, and then we see Emile Zola viewing man only as a “belly,” constructed “with charming coarseness,” and we also see how the cold despair of Dumas and Reynold infects so great an artist as Gustave Flaubert.

It is obvious that literature cannot be completely free from what Turgenev called “the pressure of time”; it is natural, for “sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.” And it may be that the evil of the day poisons more often than it should the spirit of youth and the intellectual development of our aspirations and prayers: these inspirations and prayers are poisoned by the venomous dust of the day. But “the beautiful is the rare,” as Edmond Goncourt justly said, and we most certainly often consider lacking in beauty and insignificant habitual things—these habitual things which, as they recede into the past, acquire for our descendants all the marks and qualities of true, enduring beauty. Does not the austere life of ancient Greece appear to us beautiful? Does not the bloody, stormy and creative epoch of the Renaissance with all its "habitual" cruelty enrapture us? It is more than probable that the great days of the social catastrophe we are going through now will arouse the ecstasy, awe and creativeness of the generations that will come after us.

Maxim Gorky.

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

There is a not ignoble idealism in this manifesto of Jack London's International—these seven million comrades in an organized, worldwide revolutionary movement, swayed by great passion, by a reverence for humanity, but little, if any at all, for the rule of the dead. The squallid and heartrending pictures of destitution in the United States belong to the period 1902-5 (the book appeared first in 1910). Jack London's faith was in the working class, and he believed in a time, not distant, when men will feel a higher incentive to action than the incentive of the stomach.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Pellett (Frank C.). BEGINNER'S BEE BOOK. Lippincott [1920]. 8|n. 189 pp. ill. glos., 5|n. 638.1

A practical handbook by an authority upon bees, who was formerly State Apiarist of Iowa. Mr. Pellett instructs the novice in bee-lore how he should act about the business of keeping bees, making hives, taking care of the inhabitants, and approaching the honey market. The explanations and illustrations are equally clear.

See review, p. 733.

The present issue opens with the second part of Miss Gladys D. Willcock's careful study, "A Hitherto Uncollected Version of Surrey's Translation of the Fourth Book of the Aeneid." Interesting articles connected with the theatre in Elizabethan and later times are contributed by Mr. Alwin Thaler ("The 'Free-list' and Theatre Tickets in Shakespeare's Time and After") and Mr. Allardyce Nicoll ("Doors and Curtains in Restoration Theatres"). Part 2 of Mr. H. V. Routh's thoughtful paper, "The Origins of the Essay compared in French and English Literatures," in which Montaigne, Bacon, and others are discussed and contrasted, will be read with appreciation. There are other interesting items in the number.

Denis, the whiteheaded boy or young Benjamin of the Geoghegan family, was always supposed to be cleverer and smarter than anyone else. But on his third failure to pass his medical examinations at Dublin his brothers and sisters revolted, and it was decided to ship him to Canada. Mr. Robinson's amusing little comedy tells how in the end the whiteheaded boy got his own back. We should like to record a mild protest against Mr. Robinson's stage directions, which exhibit that love of quaintness and sentimentality so rife in contemporary English and Irish literature. Thus: "Kate's off to the kitchen now. Ann't I after telling you she's a great help to her mother?" Personally we are after finding this rather painful.

POETRY.

Addleshaw (Percy). LAST VERSES. Elkin Mathews, 1920. 7|n. 72 pp. por. paper, 2/6 n.

Mr. Arundel Osborne gives us in his preface a very sympathetic picture of the author of these verses. Death, which finally overtook him in 1916, had dogged him for many years, and the best and the most moving verses in this little collection, "The Evil Playfellow," "Death the Destroyer," and "The Two Ins," record the approach of the shadow.

Freeman (John). POEMS, NEW AND OLD. Selwyn & Blount, 1920. 8|n. 318 pp., 10/6 n.

See review, p. 732.

Mr. Maunsell is a maker of rich, luminous, Mendelssohnian melodies:

Dead leaves that scatter in the wind,
You once were green,

Faint scents that bring old love to mind,
That might have been,

Years have forgotten you, and yet—
You stir between.

These lines are a fair example of his work. It is pleasant enough, but it soon chews.

822.33 SHAKESPEARE.

Greenwood (Sir George). SHAKESPEARE'S HANDWRITING. Lane, 1920. 8|n. 36 pp. front. boards, 2|n.

The author discusses from Sir E. Maunde Thompson's view that the "addition" to the Harleian MS. play of "Sir Thomas More," most of which is stated to be in the handwriting of Anthony Munday, was written by William Shakespeare. Sir George Greenwood places little faith in palaeographers, recalls how they disagree among themselves, and concludes that "if this were an ordinary case of the comparison of handwriting, no reasonable man would think.
of asserting that the 'Harleian Addition' was written by the same hand as that which wrote the 'Shakespeare signatures' - 'The wish,' he says, 'has once more been father to the thought.'

FICTION.

Mr. Brebnner is an old hand at the game, and his latest novel gives every sign of it. The plot is cleverly threaded through an atmosphere of hypnotism, a particularly sinister Oriental personage exercising a diabolical influence over his young (and beautiful) English wife. She is the unconscious sufferer of several well-known people before the usual clever and typically English doctor comes along and rescues her by a rather novel if unpleasant method of surgery. There is a blood-freezing finish to the villain's career, and a happy ending for the more virtuous of the principals. To become an adept in the craft of story-telling sometimes means advancement in literary style; had it been so in Mr. Brebnner's case he would not have opened one of his chapter-sections with such a passage as 'The crisp air of the morning had not yet let go of the world.'

If all sinners in real life were as unattractive as those created by Mr. Cowen's imagination, their contaminating influence would not, we think, constitute a serious moral danger. We certainly feel no thrill of sympathy either with the woman who betrays her husband during his absence in France or with the blackmailer who exacts his price for silence with regard to a secret in her past, or yet with the Russian refugee who is skilled in fine distinctions between killing and murder. The language, like the story, is crudely sensational.

Dawe (Carlton). A Brush with Fate. Long [1920]. 8 in. 254 pp., 7 n.

Mr. Carlton Dawe is the author of "The Woman with the Yellow Eyes," so that we may reasonably expect anything of him in his latest novel. Nor are we disappointed, for in Raya Treint's "brush with fate" we have strange, swift and unexpected developments at every turn. Raya sets the story in motion by forcing to leave her husband: "'What is your proposal?' asked the soft lisping voice of her unsympathetic mother. 'I'm not quite sure. I'm young and strong. I shall earn my own living.' 'How?' 'There are many ways.' 'I know; but none pleasant or without danger.' 'I suppose I've still got my mother.' the girl said. But she recovers from such dreadful and hopeless suspicions in a trucking time to keep her sympathy, and enlist his hearty co-operation in her rejoicing when her lover brings the final news of her husband's death in the Tower as a German spy.

At p. 279, when the author feels that some new turn is required if she is to wind up her story within reasonable limits, she decides to make her baffled hero send for the aid of Rybank, the butler at the house of the rich young roué who has died mysteriously—by poison, in fact, but unknown to the butler. "'Things have happened lately, Rybank' [commences the hero, preparatory to breaking the news]. 'Serious things. Grave things.' Indeed, sir, returned Rybank with the same detachment, the same immutable respect. Earle moved sharply. He had got to tell him somehow." Like the sensible, if dull-witted butler that he was, Rybank advised him, of course, to engage a detective to unravel the mystery, which unravelling is accomplished with quick (it takes only thirty more pages) and happyresults.

The publication of this novel by Mr. Goldring, first issued by Mannes in 1917, has been taken over by an English firm. The story deals with the war from the standpoint of a conscientious objector to military service, the final scene taking place in the garden of the house to which the hero (who is not the hero of the novel) has gone by his own men while attempting to quell the Easter rising of 1916. Mr. Goldring's scorn and indignation are very effective, without in any noticeable way detracting from his artistic purpose.

Another posthumous story by this prolific author. The scene of the racing is this time laid in Australia.

See review, p. 736.

This, as its name denotes, is emphatically a "pretty story," pre-war in atmosphere. Laughter, or, more accurately, Laffert Street, a region where "Britain rubs shoulders amiably with Bohemia," lies midway between Kensington and Chelsea. It is the home of young people who are not figures of fun, and houses not of a soul-destroying uniformity; and its population, consisting largely of painters and writers, is more skilled in the art of living than in that of money-making. In all good faith we say that the pleasant picture of inexpensive happiness thus presented to us is marred rather than perfected by the "happy ending," which bestows colossal wealth upon the principal characters. We sympathize with the author's feeling for the magic of London, and for the most part with her taste in poetry. But we cannot help thinking that in at least two passages quoted she has taken rather unwarrantable liberties with the text.

See notice, p. 726.

See review, p. 736.

In a story covering the period 1917-19 it is but natural that reminiscences of war-worry and war-fatigue should find a little more the sense of refreshment which we generally associate with Miss Silberrad's charming work. Yet we are introduced to company which often holds our interest, and often moves us to laughter. We welcome the reappearance of an old acquaintance, that inventive, imaginative genius who has already figured in more than one of this author's novels, and who, since we last met him, has added to his scientific acquirements the homelier arts of plumbing and washing up. We are also pleased to find no reticence on the part of a character who seems to us original—a strong-minded woman of mature years and rather old-fashioned type, generous and devoted to excess in deed, and almost incredibly unrestrained in language. The spectacular side of the war is virtually ignored, our attention being concentrated on the difficulties of those who had to "carry on" at home. The vagaries of Government officials, company directors, and employees of every variety are described in a quietly humorous and incisive fashion which suggests first-hand knowledge.

Our latter-day fiction in its treatment of sex questions has discarded the old-fashioned reticence, but can scarcely be said to have substituted scientific precision of statement, or even moderate familiarity to facts. Some measure of artistry, however, is, at least in theory, exacted from a novelist who undertakes to handle such questions, and this Mr. Wilkinson does not here vouchsafe to us. The world wherein he has placed the action of his latest story only differs from a lunatic asylum in that its inhabitants are all mad on one point, and subjected to no external control. A thoroughly good-natured, over forty years old, falls in love with the illegitimate daughter of a High Church clergyman (his Mentor, and a fervent advocate of celibacy). This lady becomes his mistress, but after about a week abandons him, in favour apparently of the man with whom his stepmother has eloped a few days before. Smarting under the rebuff, the hero, who finds himself in a unknown community run upon Trappist lines. From the community's point of view the arrangement seems unlikely to prove a success.

The Literary Who’s Who (Formerly Literary Year-Book) for the Year 1920. Routledge [1920]. 9 in. 376 pp. 8/6 n. 920

This book is intended to take the place of the “Literary Year-Book,” the publication of which was suspended three years ago. Sections which were among the most useful features of that work, such as the guides to British, American, and other periodical publications, are omitted from the present volume. The writer of the preface states that these sections are “already dealt with in other works of reference,” but this is not very helpful. It is surprising that in the list of authors and journalists one looks vainly for the names of Mr. Robert Lynd, Miss Rebecca West, Mr. J. C. Squire, Mr. H. M. Tomlinson, Mr. Edward Shanks, Mr. Siegfried Sassoon, Mr. Bertrand Russell, Mr. Vernon Kendall, and a number of others who should certainly be mentioned. The volume, therefore, cannot be regarded as a reliable work of reference.

Marcussen (Isaak F.). Adventures in Interviewing. Lane, 1920. 10 in. 314 pp. il. Pors. index, 16/6 n. 920

Mr. Marcussen is nothing if not enterprising, and this quality, which probably is in part attributable to his American birth, is well manifested in his record of interviews with statesmen and other public men—authors, artists, actors and theatre managers. President Wilson, Col. Roosevelt, MM. Karesky and Tereslichtenko, Prince Livov, General Smuts, Mark Twain, O. Henry, and Mr. Hugh Walpole are in the crowd of persons of distinction described in this book. Two arresting chapters are "The Real Lloyd George" and "The King-Maker," of whom exceedingly clear-cut portraits are supplied; but just what the reader most wishes to know, namely, why there came about the "dramatic break" between the two men, Mr. Marcussen does not tell us.

930-990 HISTORY.

Fletcher (C. Brunsdon). Stevenson's Germany; the Case against Germany in the Pacific. Heinemann, 1920. 9 in. 246 pp. apps. index, 12/6 n. 943.084

See review, p. 735.

If we might be permitted to use a word which conveys some impression of strong sense, we should describe this as a meritorious volume, for the reason, especially, that it seems well adapted to historical students of tender age. It abounds in attractive pictures reproducing the costumes and customs of each successive period. The text suffers inevitably from the procrustean compression of sixteen centuries and a half (from Julius Caesar to James I.) into three hundred pages. But the author has shown discrimination in his selection of facts likely to have an appeal for juvenile readers, and introduces frequently, with good effect, appropriate passages from Chaucer, Shakespeare, Hakluyt, Froissart, and other writers of less universal renown.

It is a fruitful method of reaching the mind of the general reader in a popular history like this, to show him that he has been studying history all his life, and knew it not. With a remarkable combination of modesty and daring, Mr. Snart leads his disciples on a continuous pilgrimage from Palolithic man to the imminent problems of reconstruction after the war; and, in his sketchy but effective way, he does manage to interest and enlighten.

A learned refutation of the idea that Toscanelli the astronomer instigated Columbus’ expedition to America. The subject appears to be a matter of learned controversy, on which the layman can express no opinion. In addition, the probable motives which inspired Columbus to undertake his voyage are investigated. The author’s position is, briefly, that the documents attributed to Toscanelli are forgeries, and that if they are genuine they are irrelevant.

940.3 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Beaman (Arden). The Squadron. Lane, 1920. 71 in. 324 pp. 8/6 n. 940.9

A padre in the cavalry since 1917, the author aims at depicting in plain and faithful colours the life and sentiment of that small body of young officers and other ranks that makes up a field squadron. On the whole, life is longer in this arm than in the infantry, and a closer spirit of camaraderie grows up. Early in the war, and later, the cavalry fought on horseback, in the intervening period they were usually on foot in the trenches. The author gives a welcome account of heroic deeds on the Western front about which comparatively little has been written.

The author had more than three years’ experience of captivity in Turkish prison camps, of which he paints a gloomy picture. Some of Mr. Still’s description of the treatment meted out by the Turks to their prisoners is painful to read. The book is filled with repudiation of Turkish officials; but the peasants are stated to be cheerful, generous, and simple by nature, though practically devoid of a sense of the value of human life. The Germans in Turkey, with few exceptions, seem to have been chivalrous to their British foes.

Thompson (Beatrice). Four Months in Italy in Wartime ("On Active Service" Series). Lane, 1920. 71 in. 177 pp. 5/6 n. 940.473

The author here records her experiences as "Samaritana," or V.A.D., at a military hospital in Florence. One duty she was devolving upon her and her secular colleagues was the washing of the men, which, it seems, is contrary to the code of propriety observed by Italian nursing sisters. Miss Thompson has, however, a high opinion of these ladies, as also of the patients, who at first sometimes objected to being washed, but learned to appreciate the comfort which followed upon this proceeding. The clergy also appear in a favourable light, but the aristocratic classes struck her as lacking in public spirit.

Written by Capt. Mann, of the Salonika Balloon Company, and illustrated by Mr. W. T. Wood, R.W.S., who was in the same company, this book outlines from beginning to end the parts played by each ally in the Balkans during the war, and brings into relief the meanings and importance of a long campaign which people at home have less clearly understood, perhaps, than the operations in most of the other theatres of war. The drawings, most of which are in colour, include notable views of Doiran Town and Lake, Rupel Pass, the British Military Cemetery at the Cross Roads, Dragos, the "Pipe Ridge, and Mount Olympus, from Sikia. Perhaps the most interesting of all is "Drawn Down in Flames," which shows two observers parachuting from our own balloon, from which they have just escaped, rushes past them to the earth with a fiery trail. This picture is owned by the Imperial War Museum.
The People's Atlas

Map Editor:
Geo. Philip, F.R.G.S.

Literary Editor:
Cecil Roberts.

The first Atlas published since the War in complete form; handsomely bound in cloth with two colour "jacket;" large quarto, size 13 x 10\(\frac{1}{2}\) ins. 166 pages.

The War has made the best of the old Atlases useless. The People's Atlas, on the preparation of which expert Writers and Draughtsmen have been engaged for many months, gives the new boundaries of the old European countries, and for the first time shows the newly-constituted States. The maps, being full-page in size, and produced by one of the leading map publishers, are clear, well-coloured and easily read. Other features of extraordinary and permanent interest make the Atlas one of the most remarkable books of the time.

The title of The People's Atlas has been chosen to indicate that the contents affect the future of our and other peoples. They include the main clauses of the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations, with the Labour provisions of the Peace Treaty, as well as special contributions by H. M. the King, King Albert, the Prime Minister, Lord Robert Cecil, General Smuts, President Wilson, Messrs. Clemenceau, Asquith and Henderson.

Sir Henry hadow, vice-Chancellor, Sheffield University, says of this Atlas: "It is, I think, the best work of its kind that I have ever seen. The Maps themselves are full of interest, and are admirably supplemented by the very useful Gacetter, and by the well-arranged and well-chosen collection of statistis. I hope the book will have the great success which it deserves."

Numerous other testimonials have been received from leaders of thought, including Mr. Arthur Balfour, J.P., President of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Percival Sharp, B.Sc., the Lord Bishop of Sheffield, Mr. Trehylyan Thompson, M.P., and the Mayors of Middlesbrough and Stockton.

The whole Edition of The People's Atlas, bound in handsome cloth, lettered, published at £1 1s. 0d. Net, has been acquired and is offered to readers of The Athenæum, post free, at 15s. per copy. This Edition, although large, is being sold out and cannot be reproduced at anything like the present price.

Cheap Suits must be Cheap and, make no mistake, they look it.

The manufacture of a suit begins with wood-growing, and passes through innumerable processes before it reaches the tailor, and the best qualities command the attention of specialists in each process. Specialists cannot be found willing to give their services for nothing. The man who hasalmade his trade, commands his wage, especially today.

Finally, it needs a tailor of the highest ability to make the suit, or otherwise all that has gone before is wasted.

Don't Study Price Only! Look for Quality! Look for Fair and Moderate Prices!

SEE NICOLL SUITS.

It is wonderful, but it will be more wonderful to you that Nicoll's are able to make suits incomparable for all the excellent qualities looked for in a suit at such prices as 10, 12 and 14 Gns., especially if you are a judge of good work and materials.

One reason for this is that Nicoll's fix their prices on the basis of cash or short credit, which to a considerable extent lessens the charges, and they further desire to favour their customers in regard to the incidence of Excess Profit Duty.

It is impossible to forget!

The hundreds of impressions that are conveyed to your brain by the eye or ear each day are in constant change, and yet there are men and women who can remember the most insignificant happenings. They cannot forget faces, facts or figures. They are successful because they find it impossible to forget. They are sure they know.

In ONE Evening I can make it impossible for YOU to forget.

The secret of a Reliable Memory can be learnt by you. I have taught thousands by Nature's Perfect Process, and I can teach you. But I don't ask you to sit up night after night studying, or to spend all your spare time memorising—that's the un-natural way of doing things, and only serve to make life unendurable. My course is based on Nature's Own Rule, and I will send you a New and Enlarged Explanatory Booklet of a Proven and lasting your name and address.

Get in the Ranks with Big Business Men, Artists, Scientists, and Engineers. I have supplied my Natural System to Royalty and many prominent people at home and abroad. Note this. There is no long series of Books to study.

A SPECIAL OFFER

is made to you, as a reader of THE ATHENÆUM, to benefit by a wonderful Natural System of Memory Training. But stop! Don't confuse this with an expensive "course," entailing long, weary hours of study. It is not so. It is a New Road to Success, and because it is this road, you should benefit by it, for it will help you every day of your life. After all, is pleasure, not work, a road?

THIS IS ALL YOU HAVE TO DO—write to the address given below, ask for free booklet No. A.M.10, and particulars of this special offer to THE ATHENÆUM readers, and SEND NO MONEY. Out of the hundreds of testimonials I am constantly receiving, I will quote you this one—you will receive many others when you write—

Greenwood House,
Shaldon, S. Devon.

Dear Mr. Cox,

Since writing to you a few months ago, I have given "Nature's Perfect Process," a much more searching touch, and I find that my first suggestions were entirely correct. You have found it the key to your success. I have given you an increased interest in everything said, and I am associated and the only regret is that I did not hear of it on your younger days.

This process is the only known way to get increased brain efficiency, and so one can possibly fail to derive great benefit from it if they carry out your instructions conscientiously.

With every success,
Yours sincerely,
H. S. DAVENHILL

CHARLES DICKENS (1812-1870)

DICKENS has for many years been in disrepute among the highbrows. Whether he is beginning slowly to emerge from the limbo in which the more exalted criticism has left him, we have no means of knowing. Perhaps Mr. Chesterton's valorous propaganda on his behalf is beginning to have its effect; perhaps—irony of ironies—Dickens is creeping back to his true position by way of the vague vogue of Gissing, who wrote a very fine book about him. The popular affection for Dickens has never waned; it would have been as well for the critical reputation of the country if the intellectuals had not neglected him.

That they did so, that to some extent they still do so, is inexcusable. How many times have we ourselves heard the fatally self-revealing words: "Dickens was not an artist"? Possibly, probably, the time will come when that very sentence will be held to have been typical of a period in which the current conception of art among the educated classes in England was more jejune and empty than it had ever been. The conception lingers on in the not yet exploded belief that the Hardy of the novels is not an artist. Let us hope it will not be long before both these preciosities die the death.

For Dickens was, precisely, one of the greatest artists England or the world has ever produced. To measure this colossal by the Flaubertian foot-rule is an exercise so comic, so essentially Laputan, that it must have filled the gods on high Olympus with unquenchable laughter for years, for Flaubert is a pigmy in comparison with Dickens. The comic creations of Dickens are the work of an incomparable genius. The phantasmagoric light which he so intensely projected on to the reality "never was on land or sea." He created a world and peopled it.

Such an art, so utterly individual, so unlike anything that preceded or anything that has followed it, may well need the perspective of a century for its true appreciation. Gissing made a beginning with the work; Mr. Chesterton has added a more definite insight into what is essential to the art of Dickens; but we are still long leagues away from a true critical understanding. One can find, rather one has difficulty in avoiding, what purport to be seriously critical articles which consider, with a portentous wagging of the head, Dickens as a social theorist, the shirker of the sex-problem, the defender of shallow and sentimental ideals. It is all so preposterously beside the mark.

Dickens the creator is the man we have to reckon with; one who sent out into his strange dark world gigantic figures innumerable, great shadows flung by the light of his genius on to the wall of our human cave, shadows that are more solid than the reality from which they are shaped. For the real may have three dimensions, but they are vague: the characters of Dickens may have but two, but they are definite as a diagram. Caricature, perhaps, but a strange kind of caricature that exists by its own right, and needs no incessant reference to the real for explanation; a system that endures with as much validity as an abstract mathematical space; a kingdom of absolute laughter, not so very kind, more than a little terrifying, that seems in some inexplicable way itself to supply the reason why Dickens spread, when opportunity came, the rosy mist of sentimentalism with a lavish hand. Perhaps this mysterious kingdom grew out of the monstrous vision of the world that a small boy may have who pastes labels on bottles in a blacking factory. Was it that Dickens never grew up? Or that he was grown up at the age of ten? The knee-high child who faces the world may have a secret of his own. Who knows?

M.
REVELATIONS

FROM eight o'clock in the morning until about halfpast eleven Monica Tyrell suffered from her nerves, and suffered so terribly that these hours were—agonizing, simply. It was not as though she could control them. "Perhaps if I were ten years younger . . ." she would say. For now that she was thirty-three she had a queer little way of referring to her age on all occasions, of looking at her friends with grave, childish eyes and saying: "Yes, I remember how twenty years ago . . ." or of drawing Ralph's attention to the girls—real girls—with lovely youthful arms and thighs and swift hesitating movements who sat near them in restaurants. "Perhaps if I were ten years younger . . ."

"Why don't you get Marie to sit outside your door and absolutely forbid anybody to come near your room until you ring your bell?"

"Oh, if it were as simple as that!" She threw her little gloves down and pressed her eyelids with her fingers in the way he knew so well. "But in the first place I'd be so conscious of Marie sitting there, Marie shaking her finger at Rudd and Mrs. Moon, Marie as a kind of cross between a wardeness and a nurse for mental cases! And then, there's the post. One can't get over the first: at the post comes and once it has come—who—could wait until eleven for the letters?"

"His eyes grew bright; he quickly, lightly clasped her . . . letters, darling?"

"Perhaps," she drawled, softly, and she drew her hand over his reddish hair, smiling too, but thinking: "Heaven! What a stupid thing to say!"

But this morning she had been awakened by one great slam of the front door. Bang. The flat shook. What was it? She jerked up in bed clutching the eiderdown; her heart beat. What could it be? Then she heard voices in the passage. Marie knocked, and, as the door opened, with a sharp tearing rip out flew the blind and the curtains, stiffening, flapping, jerking. The tassel of the blind knocked—knocked against the window. "Oh, voilà!" cried Marie, setting down the tray and running. "C'est le vent, Madame. C'est un vent insupportable.

Up rolled the blind; the window went up with a jerk; a white-greyish light filled the room. Monica caught a glimpse of a huge pale sky and a cloud like a torn shirt dragging across before she hid her eyes with her sleeve.

"Marie! the curtains! Quick, the curtains!" Monica fell back into the bed and then "Ring-ting-a-ping-pong, ring-ting-a-ping-pong." It was the telephone. The limit of her suffering was reached; she grew quite calm. "Go and see, Marie."

"It is Monsieur. To know if Madame will lunch at Princes' at one thirty to-day." Yes, it was Monsieur himself. Yes, he had asked that the message be given to Madame immediately. Instead of replying Monica put on her cap down and asked Marie in a small wondering voice what time it was. It was half-past nine. She lay still and half-closed her eyes. "Tell Monsieur I cannot come," she said gently. But as the door shut, anger—anger suddenly gripped her close, close, violent, half-strangling her. How dared he? How dared Ralph do such a thing when he knew how agonizing her nerves were in the morning! Hadn't she explained and described and even—though lightly, of course; she couldn't say such a thing directly—given him to understand that this was the one unforgivable thing.

And then to choose this frightful windy morning. Did he think it was just a fad of hers, a little feminine folly so be laughed at and tossed aside. Why, only last night the had said: "Ah, but you must take me seriously, too" And he had replied: "My darling, you'll no believe me, but I know you infinitely better than you know yourself. Every delicate thought and feeling I bow to, I treasure. Yes, laugh! I love the way your lip lifts—" and he had leaned across the table—"I don't care who sees that I adore all of you. I'd be with you on a mountain-top and have all the searchlights of the world play upon us."

"Heavens!" Monica almost clutched her head. Was it possible he had really said that? How incredible men were! And she had loved him—how could she have loved a man who talked like that. What had she been doing ever since that dinner party, months ago, when he had seen her home and asked if he might come and "see again that slow Arabian smile." Oh, what nonsense—that utter nonsense—and yet she remembered at the time a strange deep thrill unlike anything she had ever felt before.

"Coal! Coal! Old iron! Old iron! Old iron!" sounded from below. It was all over. Understand her? He had understood nothing. That ringing her up on a windy morning was immensely significant. Would he understand that? She could almost have laughed. "You rang me up when the person who understood me simply couldn't have." It was the end. And when Marie said: "Monsieur replied he would be in the vestibule in case Madame changed her mind," Monica said: "No, not verba, Marie, carnations. Two handfuls.

A wild white morning, a tearing, rocking wind. Monica sat down before the mirror. She was pale. The maid combed back her dark hair—combed it all back—and her face was like a mask, with pointed eyelids and dark red lips. As she stared at herself in the blueish shadowy glass she suddenly felt—oh, the strangest, most tremendous excitement filling her slowly, slowly, until she wanted to fling out her arms, to laugh, to scatter everything, to shock Marie, to cry: "I'm free. I'm free. I'm free as the wind." And now all this vibrating, trembling, exciting, flying world was hers. It was her kingdom. No, no, she belonged to nobody but Life.

"That will do, Marie," she stammered. "My hat, my coat, my bag. And now get me a taxi." Where was she going? Oh, anywhere. She could not stand this silent flat: noiseless Marie, this ghostly, quiet, feminine interior. She must be out; she must be driving quickly—anywhere, anywhere.

"The taxi is there, Madame." As she pressed open the big outer doors of the flats the wild wind caught her and floated her across the pavement. Where to? She got in, and smiling radiantly at the cross, cold-looking driver, she told him to take her to her hairdresser's. What would she have done without her hairdresser? Whenever Monica had nowhere else to go to or nothing on earth to do she drove there. She might just have her hair waved and by that time she'd have thought out a plan. The cross, cold driver drove at a tremendous pace and she felt herself be hurried from side to side. She wished he would go faster and faster. Oh, to be free of Princes' at one thirty, of being the tiny kitten in the swansdown basket, of being the Arabian, and the grave, delighted child and the little wild creature . . . . "Never again," she cried aloud, clenching her small fist. But the cab had stopped and the driver was standing holding the door open for her.

The hairdresser's shop was warm and glittering. It smelled of soap and burnt paper and wallflower brilliantine. There was Madame behind the counter, round, fat, white, her head like a powder puff rolling on a black satin pin cushion. Monica always had the feeling that they loved her in this shop and understood her—the real her—far better than many of her friends did. She was her real self here and she and Madame had often talked—quite strangely—together. Then there was George who did her hair, young, dark, slender George. She was really fond of him.

But to-day—how curious! Madame hardly greeted her. Her face was whiter than ever, but rins of bright red showed round her blue bead eyes and even the rings on her pudgy fingers did not flash. They were cold, dead, like chips of glass. When she called through the wall telephone to George there was a note in her voice that had never been there before. But Monica would not believe this. No, she refused to. It was just her imagination. She sniffed greedily the warm, scented air and passed behind the velvet curtain into the small cubicle.

Her hat and jacket were off and hanging from the peg and still George did not come. This was the first time he had ever not been there to hold the chair for her, to take her hat and hang up her bag, dangling it in his fingers as though it were something he'd never seen before—something fairy. And how quiet the shop was! There was not a sound even from Madame. Only the wind blew, shaking the old house; the wind howled, and the portraits of Ladies of the Pompadour Period looked down and smiled, cunning and sly. Monica wished she hadn't come. Oh, what a mistake to have come! Fatal. Fatal.

Where was George? If he didn't appear the next moment she would go away. She took off the white kimono. She didn't want to look at herself any more. When she opened a big pot of cream on the glass shelf her fingers trembled. There was a tugging feeling at her heart as though her happiness—her marvellous happiness were trying to get free.

"I'll go. I'll not stay," she took down her hat. But just at that moment steps sounded, and looking in the mirror she saw George bowing in the doorway. How queerly he smiled! It was the mirror of course. She turned round quickly. His lips curled back in a sort of grin and—wasn't he unshaved?—he looked almost green in the face.

"Very sorry to have kept you waiting," he mumbled, sliding, gliding forward.

Oh, no, she wasn't going to stay. "I'm afraid," she began. But he had lighted the gas and laid the tongs across and was holding out the kimono.

"It's a wind," he said. Monica submitted. She smelled his fresh young fingers pinning the jacket under her chin. "Yes, there is a wind," said she, sinking back into the chair. And silence fell. George took out the pins in his expert way. Her hair tumbled back, but he didn't hold it as he usually did, as though to feel how fine and soft and heavy it was. He didn't say it "was in a lovely condition." He let it fall, and taking a brush out of a drawer he coughed faintly, cleared his throat and said dully: "Yes, it's a pretty strong one, I should say it was."

She had no reply to make. The brush fell on her hair. Oh, oh, how mournful, how mournful. It fell quick and light, it fell like leaves; and then it fell heavy, tugging like the tugging at her heart. "That's enough," she cried, shaking herself free.

"Did I do it too much?" asked George. He crouched over the tongs. "I'm sorry." There came the smell of burnt paper—the smell she loved, and he swung the hot tongs round in his hand, staring before him. "I shouldn't be surprised if it rained." He took up a piece of her hair when—she couldn't bear it any longer—she stopped him. She looked at him; she saw herself looking at him in the white kimono like a nun. "Is there something the matter here? Has something happened?"
But George gave a half shrug and a grimace. "Oh, no, Madame. Just a little occurrence." And he took up the piece of hair again. But, oh, she wasn't deceived.

That was it. Something awful had happened. The silence—really, the silence seemed to come drifting down like flakes of snow. She shivered. It was cold in the little cubicle, all cold and glittering. The nickel taps and jets and sprays looked somehow almost malignant. The wind rattled the window frame; a piece of iron banged, and the young man went on changing the tongs, coughing over her. Oh, how terrifying Life was, thought Monica. How dreadful. It is the loneliness which is so appalling. We whirl along like leaves and nobody knows—nobody cares where we fall, in what black river we float away. The tugging feeling seemed to rise into her throat. It ached, ached; she longed to cry. "That will do," she whispered. "Give me the pins." As he stood beside her, so submissive, so silent, she nearly dropped her arms and sobbed. She couldn't bear any more. Like a wooden man the gay young George still slid, glided, handed her her hat and veil, took the note and brought back the change. She stuffed it into her bag. Where was she going now?

George took a brush. "There is a little powder on your coat," he murmured. He brushed it away. And then suddenly he raised himself and, looking at Monica, gave a strange wave with the brush and said: 'The truth is, Madame, since you are an old customer—my little daughter died this morning. A first child—" and then his white face crumbled like paper and he turned his back on her and began brushing the cotton kimono. "Oh, oh," Monica began to cry. She ran out of the shop into the taxi. The driver, looking furious, swung off the seat and slammed the door again. "Where to?"

"Princes,'" she sobbed. And all the way there she saw nothing but a tiny wax doll with a feather of gold hair, lying meek, its tiny hands and feet crossed. And then just before she came to Princes she saw a flower shop full of white flowers. Oh, what a perfect thought. Lilies of the valley, and white pansies, double white violets and white velvet ribbon. . . . From an unknown friend . . . From one who understands . . . For a Little Girl. . . . She tapped against the window, but the driver did not hear; and anyway, they were at Princes' already.

CHINOISERIE

The song of life is in my ears,
The combative, complaining years,
The rumour of the strife that goads
Rebellious earth up heaven's high roads,
The song of sooty Mulciber,
Promethens from the rock unbound,
The belching horn, the spindle's purr,
A matter of besiegling sound.
The Titans come, and Jupiter
Must hand the foaming nectar round,
They make the thunder crow and clap,
The bald-head eagle skips with glee;
They roll in Aphrodite's lap,
And smutch the beds of iricce.

Ah, shattering engines, with your tread
Bring crashing down the ancient walls:
You cannot vex the quiet dead,
Nor rock the high, heaven-built halls
Your utmost fury cannot shake,
Behind its barricade of glass,
The cardboard city by the lake,
These high hill-lawns of fadeless grass,
But anchored in the idle creek.
All your fierce storms the junk outrides;
No foreign haven shall she seek,
Nor tempt the dangerous, deep-sea tides.
No chime shall flutter from the coves
Of those tall, tiled and bell-fringed towers;
No gust shall ever lift these leaves,
Nor finger pluck the almond flowers.
No twainy slave with aching back
Shall bear in bale or bulging sack
Camphor and civet, or smooth chests
Of shark-fins, sea-slugs, swallow-nests;*
Nor shuffle down the long bazaars
With sweet conserves in straw-bound jars.
The banners on their scarlet rods
Are stirless all: no winds assail
The image of the guardian gods,
The bearded dragon’s broderied mail.
The gilded leather, silken dyes,
Yak-tails and gems for idols’ eyes.
Litter the quays: with stiff brocade,
Smooth porcelain, amber, jet and jade.
And nob-and groups of ancient men—
Bald goosp—chat of tael and yen:
Long, long deferred the hour shall be
That breaks their stifling gloom.
But when old night invests the town,
And darkness on the dream comes down,
Across the gray and wrinkled wave
In the tall poop a light shall show,
And dangling from its slender stave
The paper lantern’s lunar glow.
And then a shadow soft shall fall
On the dusky street’s still carnival;
And beardless chins shall wag a while
And seem to bow and seem to smile.

G. M. Cookson.

JOHN AND MARGARET FEATHERSTONE

Why do you strike a match?
I want to see
What time it is, wife.
It is nearly three.
How do you know that, wife, without a light? I know.
You know? Well, sure enough, you’re right.
I cannot think...

You don’t remember then?
Remember, wife?
The memories of men!

But, husband, as it seems you don’t recall,
What makes you want to know the time at all?

I couldn’t say, wife: but I cannot get
A wink of sleep—as if my eyes were set
On something that they cannot see quite clear:
My thoughts keep fumbling something very near
That yet eludes them always. And just now
I felt that, rest or no rest, anyhow,
I must know what o’clock it was. But you—
I cannot think, wife, how it was you knew Almost the very moment...

’Twas nigh three
A year ago when he smiled up at me;
And as within my arms he lay so still
I felt his body stiffen and grow chill
Against my bosom: and how should my breast
Forget the moment when his heart found rest?

THE OLD COMEDY

Philip Massinger. By A. H. Cruikshank, Professor of Greek in the University of Durham. (Oxford, Blackwell. 15s. net.)

In this country the co-operation between scholarship and criticism has never been so efficient as it has in France. Mr. Cruikshank modestly hopes that his book on Massinger will stimulate the production of similar books on other writers of the period. The ignorance of English literature is great; and we search our breasts in vain for an echo to his hope; the most we can expect is that subsequent writers on Massinger will be forced to recognize the existence of Mr. Cruikshank’s book. For it is a conscientious work, which contains, we suppose, all the information, and nearly all the serious speculations possible, about its subject. In expression of judgment and comparison, it is useful; for if any opinion is to be expressed of Mr. Cruikshank’s criticism, it is deficient rather than aberrant. It will lead no one astray and it ought to provoke reflection.

Massinger’s tragedy may be summarized for the unprepared reader as being very dreary. It is dreary, unless one is prepared by a somewhat extensive knowledge of his livelier contemporaries to grasp without fatigue precisely the elements in it which are capable of giving pleasure; or unless one is incited by a curious interest in versification. In comedy, however, Massinger was one of the few masters in the language. He was a master in a comedy which is serious, even sombre; and in one aspect of it there are only two names to mention with his: those of Marlowe and Jonson. In comedy, as a matter of fact, a greater variety of methods were discovered and employed than in tragedy. The method of Kyd, as developed by Shakespeare, was the standard for English tragedy down to Otway and to Shelly. But both individual temperament and varying epochs made more play with comedy. The comedy of Lyly is one thing; that of Shakespeare, followed by Beaumont and Fletcher, is another; and that of Middleton is a third. And Massinger, while he has his own comedy, is nearer to Marlowe and Jonson than to any of these.

Massinger was, in fact, as a comic writer, fortunate in the moment at which he wrote. His comedy is transitional; but it happens to be one of those transitions which contain some merit not anticipated by predecessors or refined upon by later writers. The comedy of Jonson is nearer to caricature; that of Middleton a more photographic delineation of low life. Massinger is nearer to Restoration comedy, and more like his contemporary—Shirley, in assuming a certain social level, certain distinctions of class, as a postulate of his comedy. This resemblance to later comedy is also the important point of difference between Massinger and earlier comedy. But Massinger’s comedy differs just as widely from the comedy of manners proper; he is closer to that in his romantic drama—in “A Very Woman”—than in “A New Way to Pay Old Debts”; in his comedy his interest is not in the follies of love-making or the absurdities of social pretence, but in the unmasking of villany. Just as the Old Comedy of Molière differs in principle from the New Comedy of Marivaux, so the Old Comedy of Massinger differs from the New Comedy of his contemporary Shirley. And as in France, so in England, the more farcical comedy was the more serious. Massinger’s great comic rogues, Sir Giles Overreach and Luke Frugal, are members of the large English family which includes Barabas and Sir Epicure Mammon, and from which Sir Tunbelly Clumsy claims descent.

What distinguishes Massinger from Marlowe and Jonson is the main an inferiority. The greatest comic characters of these two dramatists are slight work in comparison with Shakespeare's best—Falstaff has a third dimension and Epicure Mammon has only two. But this slightness is part of the nature of the art which Jonson practised, a smaller art than Shakespeare's. The inferiority of Massinger to Jonson is an inferiority, not of one type of art to another, but within Jonson's type. It is a simple deficiency. Marlowe's and Jonson's comedies were a view of life: they were, as great literature is, the transfiguration of a personality into a personal work of art, their lifetime's work, long or short. Massinger is not simply a smaller personality: his personality hardly exists. He did not, out of his own personality, build a world of art, as Shakespeare and Marlowe and Jonson built.

In the fine pages which Remy de Gourmont devotes to Flaubert in his "Problème du Style," the great critic declares:

"La vie est un dépouillement. Le but de l'activité propre de l'homme est de nettoyer sa personnalité, de la laver de toutes les souillures qu'y déposa l'éducation, de la dégager de toutes les empreintes qu'y laissèrent nos admirations adolescentes;"

and again:

"Flaubert incorporait toute sa sensibilité à ses œuvres... Hors de ses livres, où il se transvasait goutte à goutte, jusqu'à la lie, Flaubert est fort peu intéressant..."

Of Shakespeare notably, of Jonson less, of Marlowe (and of Keats) to the term of life allowed him, one can say that they se transvasaient goutte à goutte: and in England, which has produced a prodigious number of men of genius and comparatively few works of art, there are not many writers of whom one can say it. Certainly not of Massinger. A brilliant master of technique, he was not, in this profound sense, an artist. And so we come to enquire how, if this is so, he could have written two great comedies. We shall probably be obliged to conclude that a large part of their excellence is, in some way which should be defined, fortuitous; and that therefore they are, however remarkable, not works of perfect art.

The objection raised by Leslie Stephen to Massinger's method of revealing a villain has great cogency; but I am inclined to believe that the cogency is due to a somewhat different reason from that which Leslie Stephen assigns. His statement is too apriorist to be quite trustworthy. There is no reason why a comedy or tragedy villain should not declare himself, and in as long a period as the author likes; but the sort of villain who may run on in this way is a simple villain (simple, not simplicissimus). Barabas and Volpone can declare their character, because they have no inside; appearance and reality are coincident; they are forces in particular directions. Massinger's two villains are not simple. Giles Overreach is essentially a great force directed upon small objects; a great force, a small mind: the terror of a dozen parishes instead of the conqueror of a world. The force is misapplied, attenuated, thwarted, by the man's vulgarity: he is a great man of the City, without fear, but with the most abject awe of the aristocracy. He is accordingly not simple, but a product of a certain civilization, and he is not wholly conscious. His monologues are meant to be, not what he thinks he is, but what he really is; and yet they are not the truth about him, and he himself certainly does not know the truth. To declare himself, therefore, is impossible.

Nay, when my ears are pierced with widow's cries, Andundo orphans wash with tears my threshold, I only think what 'tis to have my daughter Right honourable; and 'tis a powerful charm Makes me insensible of remorse, or pity, Or the least sting of conscience.

This is the wrong note. Elsewhere we have the right:

Thou art a fool;
In being out of office, I am out of danger;
Where, if I were suspected of the trouble, I might or might not be under suspicion, or error,
Run myself finely into a prevarication,
And so become a prey to the informer,
No, I'll have none of it: 'tis enough I keep Groady at my devotion: so he serve
My purposes, let him hang, or damn, I care not.

And how well tuned, well modulated, here, the diction. The man is audible and visible. But from passages like the first we may be permitted to infer that Massinger was unconscious of trying to develop a different kind of character from any that Marlowe or Jonson had invented.

Lake Frugal, in "The City Madman," is not so great a character as Sir Giles Overreach. But Lake Frugal just misses being almost the greatest of all hypocrites. His humility in the first act of the play is more than half real. The error in his portrait is not the extravagant hocus-pocus of supposed Indian necromancers by which he is so easily duped, but the premature disclosure of villainy in his temptation of the two apprentices of his brother. But for this, he would be a perfect chameleon of circumstance. Here, again, we feel that Massinger was conscious only of inventing a rascal of the old simpler farce type. But the play is not a farce, in the sense in which "The Jew of Malta," "The Alchemist," "Bartholomew Fair" are farces. Massinger had not the personality to create great farce, and he was too serious to invent trivial farce. The ability to perform that slight distortion of all the elements in the world of a play or a story, so that this world is complete in itself, which was given to Marlowe and Jonson (and to Rabelais) and which is prerequisite to great farce, was denied to Massinger. On the other hand, his temperament was more closely related to theirs than to that of Shirley or the Restoration wits. His two comedies therefore occupy a place by themselves. His ways of thinking and feeling isolate him from both the Elizabethan and the later Caroline mind. He might almost have been a great realist; he is killed by conventions which were suitable for the preceding literary generation, but not for his. Had Massinger been a greater man, a man of more intellectual courage, the current of English literature immediately after him might have taken a different course. The comedy of perfect personality. He is not, however, the only man of letters who, at the moment when a new view of life is wanted, has looked at life through the eyes of his predecessors, and only at manners through his own.

Sonnets and Poems. By Edmund Holmes. Selected by T. J. Colden Sanderson (R. Colden Sanderson. 6s. net.)—Of all the gifts that fairy godmothers bring to infant poets in their cradles the most dangerous—and at the same time one of the most precious—is the gift of facility, the gift of copiousness. Chaucer and Shakespeare poured out their plenty with ease, and it was almost all good. Wordsworth wrote copiously, but not always with inspiration: he is improved by judicious selections. Mr. Colden Sanderson's anthology proofs. Mr. Holmes has the copiousness and facility of Wordsworth; his average is as interesting as, often more so than, Wordsworth's average: but his best is separated from Wordsworth's by the gulf that separates supreme poetry from poetry that is accomplished, thoughtful, interesting—everything but consummately inspired.

For there is never day so still, So killed to sleep, but some light breeze, Unmixed else, doth faintly till The topmost foliage of the trees, And those tall tapering cresses are stirred, And the eternal whisper heard.

Here we see Mr. Holmes at his best and giving utterance to a characteristic thought, to the thought which is fundamental in all these poems: that the eternal is close behind the transient, that the material world is a symbol of spiritual reality.

COALS TO NEWCASTLE

Roosevelt: An Intimate Biography. By William Roscoe Thayer. (Constable. 24s. net.)

In a passage describing the reception accorded to Roosevelt's addresses before Cambridge and Oxford Universities in 1910, Mr. Thayer remarks that there were doubtless carping critics, "dilettanti made tepid by over-culture, intellectual cormorants made heavy by too much information, who found novelty in what he said, and were insensible to the rush and freshness of his style."

We select this passage as being an admirable description, in American phraseology, of the important European reaction to Roosevelt, and, indeed, to America generally. Roosevelt certainly was, as his admirers claim, as typically American as one man can be, and what the tepid dilettanti of this country felt about Roosevelt is what they feel about America. Let us take the first part of Mr. Thayer's description: they "found no novelty in what he said."

Well, with the best will in the world, we cannot see that the dilettanti are to be despised for this. A culture sufficiently extensive to find no novelty in Mr. Roosevelt's remarks is perhaps fairly described as over-culture, and learning of this order may well make its possessor "tepid" and "heavy." But these gargantuan appetites are characteristic of Europe generally. Of the enormously extended European stratum represented by Roosevelt part of the general European comment would be that there is no novelty in what it says.

With respect to the second point, the rush and freshness of the style, we must remark that this torrent-analogy omits the consideration of direction. We have no desire to labour the obvious, but we think it useful to point out that energy, as such, may be envied, but not admired. The qualities in Roosevelt in which the Americans delighted, his energy and vehemence, are desirable in the sense that a good digestion and a well-regulated liver are desirable. In Europe, obsessed as we are by morality, we go on to ask what use is made of these attributes. It is possible to distinguish between a man's energy and his purpose and achievement. This division is made both in America and Europe, but whereas the European tendency is to direct attention to the purpose and achievement, the American tendency seems rather to confine attention to the energy. In the general consciousness of America, Mr. Roosevelt seems to have been classed with Niagara Falls and the Grand Cañon of Colorado, impressive phenomena witnessing to the fecundity of creation as manifested in the United States. It is this aspect of Mr. Roosevelt, his equivalent in horse-power, as it were, which evokes much of Mr. Thayer's admiration. With regard to his purpose, that is summed up for us in two phrases: in foreign policy "to speak softly and carry a big stick"; and in internal affairs, "to give everybody a square deal." With the ideal expressed in the first phrase all Europeans can sympathize; it has been the ideal of almost all their own statesmen. They cannot, therefore, be expected to find any novelty in it. The second phrase also has something familiar about it. It is not novel, although it is unintelligible. We have learned that phrases of this kind are merely hold-alls, that the content may be anything. Mr. Thayer's account is not sufficiently detailed for us to discover what it meant in this case. But we are enabled to see that Mr. Roosevelt would not regard any deal as square which fundamentally disturbed American social conditions. Lenin's deals, for instance, appealed to him as merely shapeless. The great trusts of the United States are the trade unions. The square, in fact, seemed to enjoy the properties usually attributed to a circle.

The American complaint is justified. We do not listen with attention to that which holds no novelty for us. Why should we?

INDUSTRIAL HISTORY

A Social and Industrial History of England, 1815-1918. By J. F. Rees. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

Historians, whether of Peloponnesian Wars or Holy Roman Empires or Trade Unions, ought to decide what their subject really is before they begin to write about it. At first sight this statement may seem silly and otiose to many people, but the prevalence of bad historians and worthless histories is very largely due to the confusion of this basic rule. To know what one wants to write about is really not so easy a matter as people who do not write books imagine. It is not enough to sit down in some quiet hour and say to oneself: "I will write a history of Trade Unions" or "I will write a social and industrial history of England from 1815 to 1918." The would-be historian must then take a step very rarely taken, but of the first importance; he must ask himself whether his history is to be a history of what are called facts or a history of what are called ideas. The difference in value between the two books under review springs almost entirely from the fact that their authors have answered this question differently.

Mr. Rees, indeed, has possibly never put the question to himself with this distinction. His book is mainly a history of facts. When one has read its 180 pages—a task by no means easy—one is left with a view of history distinct, but unintelligible. An infinite series of "facts" pop up out of the darkness of the universe, are illuminated for a second by Mr. Rees's rushlight, and then are submerged once more in unintelligible darkness. James Brindley constructs a canal to carry the coal of the Duke of Bridgewater: the price of wheat in 1785 is 10s.; a Reform Act is passed in 1832; 248 railway Bills were promoted in 1845-6; Joseph Arch entered the House of Commons in 1885; the Great War broke out in 1914, and this book was first published in 1920. We do not wish to be unfair to Mr. Rees, but that is literally the impression of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries which we have carried away from his history. He does, of course, continually mention ideas, but he has not got clear in his own mind the relative importance of those ideas and of the facts which were caused by them.

The new and revised edition of Mr. and Mrs. Webb's well-known book shows up Mr. Rees's weakness rather cruelly. Over and over again the two volumes cover exactly the same ground, and, despite Mr. and Mrs. Webb's passion for detail (and particularly for the detail of structure and organization), it is far easier to read and remember their 800 than Mr. Rees's 180 pages. That is because they are quite clear in their own minds as to the relative importance of facts and ideas. Their view of history is indicated in the title of their book; they are writing a history not of trade unions but of trade unionism. Their book probably contains just as many facts to the square inch as does that of Mr. Rees, but with them the fact is always subordinated to the ideas which produced it. One example will clearly show this difference. Mr. Rees tells us about the Osborne Judgment, and he leaves us with the impression that in 1909 the House of Lords delivered a judgment which had a great effect upon the trade unions and the Labour Party. Mr. and Mrs. Webb give us precisely the same facts, but they leave us with the impression that certain ideas, in the upper and middle classes caused the creation of the House of Lords to give a judgment which revolutionized the legal position of trade unions, and that this had a tremendous reaction upon working-class ideas. The difference thus stated may seem small; it is really enormous, for it is the difference between a chronologic table and a history.
SECRETS OF LONDON
Unknown London. By Walter George Bell. (Lane, 6s. 6d. net.) II.*

Much less familiar to "Westminster pilgrims" than the effigies in the Isip Chapel, described by Mr. Bell, are Abbot Litlington’s famous Jerusalem Chamber, the dignified comeliness of the interior of which is a revelation to beholders who previously have seen only the outside: the same abbot’s stately dining hall; and the Jericho Parlour, close by, with its striking linenfold paneling. To climb into John Bradshaw's "snugger" in the south-west tower of the Abbey, whence the Lord President’s ghost, uttering unseemly noises, has been said to emerge twice a year; to visit Henry V.’s Chapron, where he had the bones of Catherine of France; to view the Muniment Room; and above all, under the guidance of Mr. David Weller, to wander in the triforium gallery, behind the range of stilted columns, and to gaze upon the fine vistas and changing aspects presented by the open-traceried double arches—to survey these things is to learn that there is quite another Westminster Abbey than that ordinarily seen. The amazing triforium is a huge upper church, with an area of thousands of square feet, the existence of which is unsuspected by the few generalities of people.

Close to the Chapter House, but not now within the Abbey precincts, is Richard II.’s Jewel House, or Tower, which perhaps at one period was the monastic "look-up." Like the Chapel of the Pyx, it became one of the royal treasure houses, just as about a century earlier the crypt beneath the Chapter House had been employed as a "treasury of the wardrobe"—until 1306, when it was ransacked by Richard de Podlicote. This mediaeval "cracksmen" and his monastic accomplices must have been endowed with considerable prowess and a large price of diablerie. Used in later years as the Parliament Office, and now under the agis of the Board of Trade, the Jewel Tower, which is another fragment of really "unknown" London, has three floors: two basement rooms with groined roofs, seemingly Abbot Litlington’s work; a first floor with vaulting probably put in during the seventeenth-century restoration; and a top floor with this ancient roof. A good external view of the tower is obtainable from College Mall.

On the opposite side of Old Palace Yard the persistent explorer will discover a gem of original late Gothic work in the Cloister Court of the Houses of Parliament. This quadrangle of cloisters, and the annexed oratory (in which Cromwell is said to have signed Charles’s death warrant); the crypt of St. Stephen; and Westminster Hall; are the only remains of the mediaeval Royal Palace of Westminster. The general effect of the beautiful fan-vaulting recalls the cloisters of Gloucester Cathedral—and even, distantly, the Divinity School at Oxford, notwithstanding the smaller scale, the different treatment, and the absence of pendants. The cloisters of Westminster Palace ought to be included in the itinerary laid down for visitors to the Houses of Parliament; and it is to be hoped that the garish and wholly inharmonious hat-rails and other fittings which disfigure these cloisters, together with the personal possessions and adornments of our excellent legislators, will some day be swept into another sphere, or at all events into a more modern part of the spacious building set aside for their labours.

Mr. Bell devotes a chapter to the mumified head at St. Botolph’s Church, Aldgate, which nearly seventy years ago was discovered in the church of the Holy Trinity, Minories (at one period the Abbey Church of the Nunnery of St. Clare of Assisi). The head has long been conjectured, on the slenderest grounds, to be a relic of Henry Grey, Duke of Suffolk, who was executed in 1554. Grey had lived in the Minories, after the surrender of the Abbey, but his body was buried in the Tower. The duchess married Adrian Stokes, Suffolk’s groom of the chambers, within a fortnight of the duke’s execution: so she does not seem to have been a very disconsolate or pious widow, who might have been likely to wish to remove the head to the church. The present writer considers that the alleged resemblance of this head to the portraits of Grey is fanciful, and that a lively imagination is required to discern a second axe-mark on the shrivelled and dingy skin of the neck. The plane of severance indicates that the head was separated by a single well-directed and powerful stroke. Moreover, a second axe-mark, if present, would not prove the head to be Grey’s. The appearance of the relic also points away from the hypothesis that it is a relic of the ghoul-like proceedings of a sexton of the parish who, in 1786, supplied himself and his cronies with wood by the simple method of sawing and chopping up the occupied coffins in the over-filled vaults. Two further suggestions have been made concerning the identity of this mysterious head. The more probable of these (referred to in a communication, dated February 15, 1912, from the Rev. J. A. Dodd, Rector of Ewthorne, to the Rev. J. F. Marr, Vicar of St. Botolph’s, to whom the reviewer is indebted for the loan of the letter) is that the head may be that of Edmund de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, who was executed in 1513. There is evidence that Edmund de la Pole interfered with his infant daughter, in St. Minories Church, and the last-named had been one of the nuns. Edmund’s father was John, Duke of Suffolk, but the title and estates were attainted; and Edmund, who on his pardon assumed only the title of earl, at a later date broke his word, and in 1502 adopted the title of duke. It appears highly probable that the soi-disant duke and the later Duke of Suffolk became mixed up in the minds of popular tradition-mongers. The remaining suggestion is based upon an uncompleted entry for April 28, 1554, in the Diary of Henry Machyn. The diarist, referring to the execution of Thomas Grey, Suffolk’s brother, says:

The xxvij day of April was hadded on Towrie Hyll, between ix and x of the cloke a-fone, my lord Thomas Grey, the duke of Suffolk’s bastard brother, and beord at Alhamecar’s Barklyn, and the hed [unfinished].

Machyn may have intended to add that the head was presented to one of the city gates; or, as has been suggested (R. Davey, "The Nine Days’ Queen: Lady Jane Grey and her Times," 1909), that it was deposited in some special place of safety—perhaps the Abbey Church of the Minories. Here the problem must be left to the surmises of readers.

Another City church, St. James’s, Garlick Hill, possesses a disconcerting puzzle. Less known even than the head at St. Botolph’s, the relic at St. James’s has been supposed to be the mumified body of a Lord Mayor of long ago: but there is no evidence in support of this hypothesis.

The illustration facing page 168, showing the artistically terrifying statue of Charles I., which from 1672-1738 stood in the Stocks Market, and originally represented John Sobieski, King of Poland, suggests a remarkable resemblance in style to a ridiculous copper-gilt effigy of Augustus the Strong, Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, which since 1755 has decorated the Hauptplatz of Dresden Neustadt. This statue, by Wiedemann of Augsburg, shows the Elector dressed as a Roman, with a full-bottomed wig. He is perched on a horse, the head of which is too small, and the animal seems to be partly balanced on its tail. It is scarcely likely that both these features came from the same designer’s hand. But the question arises in the mind—was the Dresden...
bogy a case of the sincerest form of flattery, on the part of the classically-inspired Wiedemann.

On page 205 is an allusion to "the late Member of Parliament ... who invented the safety Lucifer match." Presumably this was Mr. (afterwards Sir) Isaac Holden, who, it is common knowledge for many years declared that in 1829 he had invented matches ignitable by friction. It is not so well known that at Keighley, in 1893, he publicly renounced his claim to priority. Sir Isaac's idea had been, not a safety match, nor a match ignitable by friction, but the use, as a basis for a friction match, of a sulphur-coated splint—another matter altogether. The inventor of the friction match (1827) was John Walker of Stockton-on-Tees; and safety matches were invented by Lundström, of Jönköping, Sweden, in 1855.

A NEW MYSTIC?
The Release of the Soul. By Gilbert Cannan. (Chapman & Hall, 5s. net.)

In the year 1916 Mr. Cannan attained to a condition in which he could think with an extraordinary clarity, but without words. He still preserved the habit of writing, but his writing had nothing to do with his increasing activity—an activity which absorbed every motion and every thought, and finally began to express itself in symbols. One of these symbols burned itself into his brain in whirling fire. Presently it ceased to whirl, and took the form of a circle cut out by two diameters at right angles to one another. At this moment Mr. Cannan knew that something had been born into the world of such tremendous importance that the disasters then overtaking his country and mankind were in comparison trivial. But he could not connect this something with the life around him until one day he lettered the two diagonals AA' and BB'. The centre of the circle he marked G. After doing this his mind became subject to convulsions. He decided, in a "convulsion of approval," that G stood for God. The point A he took to be Man. He tried some simple combinations, but as they were attended by no convulsions he did not adopt them. Then, lying alone one day in a cornfield, he called the swaying corn B, and his imagination "almost expired of convulsions." After that, he says, he lost all interest "in A and B and mathematics," and said good-bye to his intellect "without a pang of regret."

One would expect a book written after such a renunciation to be unusual, and Mr. Cannan's new book is, indeed, unusual. To one unversed in such matters it seems to belong to what are roughly called "mystic" writings. The words God, Soul, Life, occur with extraordinary frequency, but the variety of their syntactical connections throws no light on their meanings. Since we are neither provided with, nor enabled to deduce, definitions of Mr. Cannan's chief terms, we find his book unintelligible. In this we must differ from some other people, or else there would be no point in Mr. Cannan writing his book.

Nevertheless, whether it is that Mr. Cannan has unwittingly allowed some admixture of intellect in the book, or whether we have a greater degree of mystical insight than we supposed, we do gain certain impressions from it. We gather that Mr. Cannan finds the present state of society undesirable, and that he thinks more attention should be paid to the "spiritual" values in life. In this we are happy to agree with him. He also thinks that the great art of the future will be the drama, since it can most profoundly stir the group consciousness of the people. We doubt the implied criterion for art, and we doubt the statement of fact. But we find it an interesting point of view, and must be forgiven for our wish that there were more such intelligible "bits" scattered through the book.

CONVERSATIONAL OPINIONS
About It and About. By D. Willoughby. (Fisher Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.)

The successful Essayist must have either a rare personality, or the secret of a nicely-compounded mixture of qualities, wherein no ingredient is so persistently dominant that we weary of the flavour. For we read essays as we listen to monologues, with—can it be doubted?—a latent hostility towards this assertion of another individuality. What qualifies the gentleman to talk at large?

Mr. Willoughby succeeds in lulling the spirit of carping inquiry. We listen with no impatience to what he has to say, and if thereafter we do indeed come out by the same door as in we went, it is not without an appreciable improvement in our spirits. Roughly speaking, Mr. Willoughby touches on all the burning or still glowing topics of the day, on peace and war, on housing, on Labour, on Ireland, on servants civil and domestic, and many other more or less immediate doubts and difficulties. If our opinion does not invariably coincide with his, we constantly appreciate an optimism which looks intelligently round the menacing horizon without losing its temper or good cheer. Possibly service in the war has developed and steeled this trait in those who originally possessed it; it is a kind of intellectual gallantry. This quality, and the good-humour with which it is allied, are particularly noteworthy since Mr. Willoughby is no more satisfied with the present course of the world than might be expected of one who looks upon it with open-eyed and unprejudiced intelligence. But whatever misgivings may result from the survey, he keeps his head, avoiding the two rocks of sentiment—regret and indignation. He has neither tears for the ideals that have fallen, nor rage for those just tottering to discredit.

He considers the Primrose League or the British Matron in a pleasantly satirical mood; he can discuss public schools without excitement, the daily newspaper with charity.

Mr. Willoughby is no less definitely modern in his manner than in the topics he discusses. In one respect, however, he follows an older tradition, making wide use of literary and other allusions and anecdotes. It is not in him an archaic affectation, and it creates a reassuring atmosphere, as of the continuity and stability of human interests. But he has not invariably used this legitimate and instructive method of illustration with the discretion which would render it most effective. We have a sense, at times, that an appropriate page of the commonplace-book is defraying our entertainment. Anecdotes and allusions, like quotations or trespassers, must carry off their intrusion with a certain casual or inevitable air.

The rational good-humour characteristic of the book, a really precious quality at this time, naturally brings over in laughter, spontaneous and frequent enough to convey to the reader a feeling of expectant animation. Occasionally, and only quite noticeably perhaps in the not very helpful remarks on "Certain Artists," the easy note of mirth has been forced, and we lose sight of the sanity and vigour which commend the book as a whole, and find ourselves momentarily in the undifferentiated waste of cleverish printed matter.

But if we note these blemishes, we would not give them undue importance, or allow them to spoil the impression with which we close this entertaining book. And to the last epithet we will add: comforting. For Mr. Willoughby's cheerfulness is not a mood he will lay aside with his pen; if he can look undismayed at the wreckage of the storm and the continued unpropitious weather, it is that he turns again resolutely towards an ideal that lifts above the clouds—the brave hope of the League of Nations.

"AURELIA"

Aurelia and Other Poems. By Robert Nichols. (Chatto, 5s.)

Mr. Nichols has adopted the principle of the apple-women who put their most attractive fruit at the top of the basket. The "Four Idylls"—with which his book opens—are by far the best things in this latest collection of his poems; in many ways, we are inclined to think, the best things he has yet written. We see displayed in them all those poetical qualities by which Mr. Nichols's most satisfying work is distinguished—fulness and melodiousness of utterance, a flow and a copiousness, a natural grand manner recalling, at its best, the thunders of the Giant Age before the flood. In an Age where a certain dryness, a curiously costive habit of mind distinguish the work of too many of our poets, it is satisfactory to find someone who believes in the grand poetical manner and can give us such a fine example of it as "The Sprig of Lime." This poem, the most happily conceived and executed of the "Four Idylls," belongs in the best sense to the great tradition. It is not one of those carefully manufactured sham antiques, of which we have seen recently only too many examples—pieces that remind one of the works of the poets of the past, and yet are as profoundly different from them as the Academy picture, painted according to a mixed formula derived from all the recognized masters, is different from a picture by Raphael or Velasquez or Rembrandt. It is something new and individual expressing itself in established poetical forms.

Scatter your fumes, O lime,
Loose from each his rigid star of citron bloom,
Tangled beneath the labyrinthine boughs,
Cloud on such stinging cloud of exhalation
As reeks of youth, fierce life, and summer's prime ....

Tinge the air
Of the midsummer night that now begins,
At an owl's soaring flight from dusk to dusk,
And downward from the giddy bat,
Hawking against the lustre of bare skies,
With something of thy unfathomable bliss
He, who lies dying here, knew once of old
In the serene trance of a summer night,
When with th' abundance of his young bride's hair
Loosed on his breast he lay and dared not sleep,
Listening for the scarlet motion of your boughs,
Which sighed with bliss as she with helpless sleep,
And drinking desperately each homied wave
Of perfume wafted past the ghostly blind,
First knew th' impenetrable and bitter sense
Of Time that hates all who need not hate,
Shed your last sweetness, limes!

This is surely "the right thing" (though one is not quite sure of that giddy bat and one or two other words and phrases in the poem which border perilously on fustian). If Mr. Nichols can repeat and develop the achievement of the "Four Idylls" and of parts of his earlier "Faun's Holiday," he will, we think, secure for himself a pretty safe and definite niche in the cathedral of our poetry.

But if the "Sprig of Lime" is the right thing, "Aurelia," the sonnet sequence which gives its name to the volume, is distinctly the wrong thing. In these sonnets Mr. Nichols has deliberately challenged, by his matter and manner, comparison with Shakespeare. He has asked for it; let us see then what happens when we put "Aurelia" to the touch. The Shakespearean sonnet, with its balanced antitheses and contrasting repetitions, is a form specially devised for expressing the greatest amount of thought in the smallest possible space. It is a form which, apart from its content, has many charms. It possesses a peculiarly rich chiming music of its own—a music that was constantly abused by the lesser sonneteers and lyrists of Shakespeare's day, who employed the antitheses and repetitions, so praised by the great intellectual poet, with endlessly subtle possibilities of compressed argument and description, simply as so many sounding bells and cymbals. Shakespeare's worst sonnets are little better than the exercises in chiming sound of his contemporaries. And his best, if you choose to read them with the doors of your intelligence closed, are superficially, tunes written according to the same receipt. Mr. Nichols seems, in most of his sonnets, to have taken Shakespeare's superficial melody without Shakespeare's intellectual content. A foreigner, who did not understand English, might listen to the reading of a sonnet by Shakespeare and a sonnet by Mr. Nichols and imagine, from the mere sound of the words, the cadences and phrasing, that the two poems were very similar. But listen to them with the intellect as well as with the outer ear, and you will find them very different. Taking up the volume of Shakespeare's sonnets we select almost at random one from among the poems liked in general theme to Mr. Nichols's sonnets of passionate love for a hateful woman.

When my love sweats that she is made of truth,
I do believe her, though I know she lies,
That she might think me some untutored youth,
Unlearned in the world's false subtleties.
Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,
Simply I credit her false-speaking tongue.
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?
And wherefore say not I that I am old?
O! love's best habit is in seeming trust,
And age in love loves not to have years told.
Therefore I lie with her and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flatter'd be.

These fourteen lines are packed with a whole complicated spiritual drama; to the making of them has gone an immense amount of observation and analysis. Reading such a sonnet one can understand the meaning of Wordsworth's criticism: "Shakespeare could not have written an epic; he would have died of a plethora of thought." He had to canalize his thought in dramatic form, force it through the narrow fountains of the sonnet. We turn now to Mr. Nichols's sequence, and are struck at once by the emptiness of his sonnets. The fountains are there, with their flared tritons, their curved and laughing masks; but the water, the living water of thought that should lend significance to the whole design—where is it? A little trickle runs from the dolphin mouths, slowly and intermittently overbrims the cornucopias of the allegoric figures. That is all. It will be well to quote an example.

Corrupt, corrupt!—the mildness of your eyes,
Your patience and the dangers that are worse
In every look some miracle of lies,
In every gesture fount of painless fair.
Wherefore this instant gentleness of use,
Which looks me safe, and yet I fear itignon
To further a more deliberate abuse,
Or by a feared divulgence past constrained?
Learn, did I mark the North wind norward blow,
Tinderwood sink where floated clumsy iron,
Fire in a still pool freeze, frost chafing blow,
And the plump eve slaughter the starving lion,
I would believe all self from self estranged
Sorener than in that I am changed.

The content of this is extraordinarily small. A meagre and simple thought is expanded, by means of the technical devices of Elizabethan diction, into fourteen lines. Shakespeare, on the other hand, compresses a very large and complicated series of thoughts into a sonnet, making the conventional antitheses and repetitions to express in the smallest possible space the elaborate pros and cons of emotional and intellectual strife. Mr. Nichols, like many of the minor Elizabethan lyrists, uses them simply for the sake of their sound, their rich baroque handsomeness of appearance. That is the principal and, to our mind, damming defect of his sonnets. They have no substance. The fountains are dry, the parched stone faces open their mouths to no purpose; we are at a loss to see why the monument was built.
MORE than once in reading this attractive little book have we been visited by the suspicion that Mr. Ward is a very delicate and subtle ironist. This may be merely a tribute to his originality, or it may be an indication of a disagreement so profound as to make it difficult for us to suppose that Mr. Ward was completely serious. We believe, however, that our suspicion was unjustified; what we were inclined to regard as a disproof by a reducio ad absurdum is to be taken as a strange, but logical, consequence of principles in which Mr. Ward believes.

Mr. Ward’s book is divided into two parts: “Manners” and “Morals.” In the first part is developed a theory of Life, of Reality, of the nature of Knowledge. Here, as elsewhere, Mr. Ward is deceptively simple. He is, in reality, both original and subtle, but he is so easy to read that there is a constant temptation to read too fast. In his analysis of “desire,” for example, he begins by instancing a baby crying for something. This seems to reduce “desire” to sufficiently simple terms, but it is a deceptive simplicity. We gradually become aware that Mr. Ward is surveying this term from a slightly odd angle, until presently, after a discussion of “Activity” and the function of “Knowledge,” we find the remark:

“It will be seen that what has hitherto been called desire is really the same as value, and that the terms are interchangeable. Which is the better term would be hard to decide; both have to be used a little out of their ordinary meaning.”

The meaning attributed to these terms by Mr. Ward only becomes clear by following out his whole argument. Desire and Activity are of the essence of man’s nature. They are different for each man, for the profoundest reality in each man is unique and incommunicable. It cannot be the subject of knowledge, for knowledge can only be stated in “general” terms. The “particular,” in every case, cannot be the subject of knowledge. Thought exists to give purpose and variety to activity. This activity manifests itself in life as the playing of games.

The interest of life is the interest of a game. I play for certain stakes; if I play for nothing else I must play for my food. But with a mind I can diversify the game. I set myself this goal or that, and perhaps make certain moves, which may not be thinking out. I meet various impediments against which I must take measures. When I reach my goal I find others beyond. So the interest never ceases till life ceases.

It follows that “such conceptions as happiness and unhappiness are really foreign to life. There exists neither the one nor the other. There are degrees of interest only.”

There is much, we believe, that is true in Mr. Ward’s theory, although, as part of its foundations consists of a theory of knowledge, it is, of course, interminably debatable.

But the most provocative and stimulating part of Mr. Ward’s argument is developed in the second section of the book, the section dealing with Morals. We are introduced to that familiar object, the something “good in itself and apart from the uses to which it can be put: absolutely good, as the phrase goes.” But our natural fear of being once more exercised on the old treadmill proves to be delightfully unwarranted. We are told, almost immediately, that this absolutely good something is found most clearly in the taboo. The act enjoined by a taboo is good in itself, and, as Mr. Ward says, a “sacred taboo.”

If an act is entirely senseless, it is difficult to show that it is a moral act—assuming the “absolute” theory of morals, of course. For if it is not entirely senseless it may be useful, and the more useful it is the more doubtful becomes the purity of its moral nature. Some savage customs, however, seem so completely idiotic that we can only suppose them to be “absolutely good.” In the morality of our own race and time this absolute quality is, to some extent, obscured. Humanistic morality preaches nothing, Mr. Ward thinks, that is not also counselled by mere prudence.

In other words, there is no difference ultimately between selfishness and altruism, inasmuch as a proper regard for one’s own interest is a proper regard for the interests of others.

It is, in fact, probably impossible to point out the indubitably moral element in any given complex, and human life, as a whole, bears no resemblance at all to that of a moral being. But to expect that it should is to display a complete misunderstanding of the nature of the moral consciousness and of life. Mr. Ward here reaches the most stimulating part of his theory. He asserts that “the moral consciousness does not depend on our brain cells.” The moral consciousness, for one thing, demands free-will; but man cannot exercise free-will. We are free only within limits; we are good, then, only within limits. Since our responsibility is not absolute, our acts cannot be moral. Important factors, the components of our own being and surroundings, the fact that we are alive with this life, are not within our control. To be good we must be free, and we are not free. The moral consciousness can only pass negative judgments; it can only say, “What is ought not to be;” it cannot go on to say what should be, for that requires conditions of which we have not, and cannot have, any experience. The whole conception of “ought,” therefore, rests on an error. The moral consciousness, therefore, has no relation to practice.

But not only the nature of morality, but the nature of life, shows us that the two are fundamentally opposed:

Facts are too strong: from the first breath to the last life is in essence cruel. There is nothing that lives but lives on the life of something else; such things as disease and death, or even the merely inessential to existence, are a form of moral dignity. . . . A moral being can, no doubt, bear suffering with fortitude: but the thing or being that forced this suffering upon him is not moral.

And when men learn to separate life and morality, when they realize that life is given them on terms which make a moral life impossible, what will happen? Mr. Ward sketches two possibilities. On the one hand, man may find life intolerable; he may prefer extinction. On the other, life may assume new forms. Life has produced the bee-community, the nest-building instincts of birds—can who can say what its possibilities may be?

Mr. Ward’s concluding chapter is almost the most original of them all. On the basis of his theory that all activity is of the nature of a game or problem to be solved, he explains the comical or the witty as that which furnishes an unfamiliar solution of a familiar problem. We are familiar with falling down, for instance, but not with falling as a clown falls. An ingenious move in chess will make us laugh. For a jest to be permanent, therefore, it should be based on a condition familiar to everybody, and a condition which is a permanent source of surprise. These conditions are precisely fulfilled by the appearance of the moral consciousness. The contrast between man as he is and his claims as a moral being is a never-failing surprise. The sense of humour is “the subtest and most permanent exemplification of the moral consciousness.”

We have reproduced Mr. Ward’s arguments at some length—although they are too closely-knit for such a sketch—to do justice to the richness of his arguments. He follows from his premises and his conclusions still occupy an important position in moral philosophy. Those who accept them may find Mr. Ward’s conclusions distasteful; that man’s acquaintance with the “absolutely good” should involve the completely non-moral character of life may seem a little disconcerting. To others Mr. Ward’s result will appear as a reducio ad absurdum. There may even be moments when, like ourselves, they suspect Mr. Ward of irony.
GROWTH OF THE SOIL. By Knut Hamsun, (Gyldendal, 9s. net.)

It is difficult to account for the fact that "Growth of the Soil," the latest novel by the famous Norwegian writer, is only the second of his works to be translated into English. Knut Hamsun is no longer young; he has fulfilled his early promise and his reputation is assured and yet, except for "Shallow Soil," which was published some years ago, we have had nothing but the echo of his fame to feed upon. Perhaps this is not wholly lamentable. How often we find ourselves wishing that we had the books of some writer we treasure to read for the first time, and if the novel before us is typical of Knut Hamsun's work—as we have every reason to believe it is—there is a feast before us. Here, at least, are four hundred and six pages of small type excellently translated, upon which we congratulate the Norwegian publishers and the translator, whose name does not appear.

If "Growth of the Soil" is to be said to have any plot at all—any story—it is the very ancient one of man's attempt to live in fellowship with Nature. It is a trite saying when we are faced with a book which does renew for us the wonder and the thrill of that attempt that never was a time when its message was more needed. But solitude is no cure for sorrow, and virgin country will not make anyone forget the desolation he has seen. Such a life is only possible for a man like the hero, Isak, a man who has known no other and can imagine none. Nevertheless, there is something in the hearts of nearly all of us an infinite delight in reading of how the track was made, the bush felled, the log hut built, so snug and warm with its great chimney and little door, and of how there were animals to be driven to the long pastures, goats and sheep and a red and white cow. In the opening chapter of "Growth of the Soil," Knut Hamsun gives us the picture of an immense wild landscape, and there is a track running through it, and we spy a man walking towards the north carrying a sack.

This or that, he comes: the figure of a man in this great solitude. He trudges on; bird and beast are silent all about him; now and again he utters a word or two speaking to himself. "Eyah—well, well . . ." so he speaks to himself. Here and there, where the moors give place to a kindlier spot, an open space in the midst of the forest, he lays down the sack and goes exploring; after a while he returns, leaves the sack on his shoulders again, and trudges on. So through the day, no tinge in the sun: night falls, and he throws himself down on the heather, resting on one arm . . .

The man is Isak. It is extraordinary, how, while we follow him in his search for the land he wants, the author gives us the man. His slowness and simplicity, his immense strength and determination, even his external appearance, short, sturdy, with a red beard sticking out and a frown that is not anger, are as familiar as if we had known him in our childhood. It is, indeed, very much as though we were allowed to hold him by the hand and go with him everywhere. The place is found; the hut is built, and a woman called Inger comes from over the hills and lives with him. Gradually, but deeply and largely, their life grows and expands. We are taken into it and nothing is allowed to escape us, and just as we accepted Isak so everything seems to fall into place without question. "Growth of the Soil" is one of those few novels in which we seem to escape from ourselves and to take an invisible part. We suddenly find to our joy that we are walking into the book as Alice walked into the looking-glass and the author's country is ours. It is wonderfully rich, satisfying country, and of all those who dwell in it, gathered round the figures of Isak and Inger, there is not one who does not live. At the end Isak is an old man and his life is ebbing, but the glow, the warmth of the book seems to linger. We feel, as we feel with all great novels, that nothing is over.

THE TALL VILLA. By Lucas Malet. (Collins, 7s. 6d. net.)

"But I haven't been alone."

And even this moaning morsel of confession ensued; so that there would, how gladly, have let things rest. For all the encomposing of a thorough and detailed confidence sprang glaringly into evidence directly her countenance made itself manifest.

"Not alone, darling Fan? So very much the better—but how exciting! And who, if I'm not too impatiently inspective in asking, was your much-to-be-envied guest?"

"Ah, my dear, if I could tell you." Frances, after an instant's hesitation, said as she rose, all of a piece, to her feet . . .

This quotation from "The Tall Villa," though nicely typical of the author's latest style of writing is, we assure the reader, a by no means extravagant example. For the first fourteen pages we are not particularly conscious of any peculiarity, but then with a sentence that finishes: "so that there really remained to her, as means of loco motion, only bus, Underground, the elusive taxi or her own slender, high-instepped feet," this vague reminiscent perfume, as the author might say, begins to unbottle itself. On page forty-one the odour is become so pungent that we do not know whether to laugh or to cry. The heroine, startled by a sound which she takes for a pistol shot and her husband for a motor tyre, is in his arms. He is ogling her eyes with an avidity which...
MARGINALIA

I have recently been fortunate in securing a copy of that very rare and precious novel "Delina Delaney," by Amanda M. Ros, author of "Irene Iddesleigh" and "Poems of Puncture." Mrs. Ros's name and fame are known to a small and select band of lovers of literature. But by these few she is highly prized; one of her readers, it is said, actually was at the pains to make a complete manuscript copy of "Delina Delaney," so great was his admiration and so hopelessly out of print was the book. Let me recommend the volume, Mrs. Ros's masterpiece, to the attention of enterprising publishers.

"Delina Delaney" opens with a tremendous, an almost, in its richness of vituperative eloquence, Rabelaisian denunciation of Mr. Barry Pain, who had, it seems, treated "Irene Iddesleigh" with scant respect in his review of the novel in Black and White. "This so-called Barry Pain, by name, has taken upon himself to criticize a work, the depth of which fails to reach the solving power of his borrowed, and, he'd have you believe, varied talent," But "I care not for the opinion of half-starved upstarts, who don the garb of a shabby-genteel, and fain would feed the mind of the people with the worthless scraps of stolen fancies." So perish all reviewers! And now for Delina herself.

The story is a simple one. Delina Delaney, daughter of a fisherman, loves and is loved by Lord Gifford. The baleful influence of a dark-haired Frenchwoman, Madame de Maine, daughter of the Count-av-Nevo, comes between the lovers and their happiness, and Delina undergoes fearful torments, including three years' penal servitude, before their union can take place. It is the manner, rather than the matter, of the book which is remarkable. Here, for instance, is a fine conversation between Lord Gifford and his mother, an aristocratic dame who strenuously objects to his connection with Delina. Returning one day to Columba Castle she hears an unpleasant piece of news: her son has been seen kissing Delina in the conservatory.

"'Home again, mother?' 'He boldly uttered, as he gazed reverently in her face.'

"'Home to Hades!' returned the raging high-bred daughter of distinguished effeminacy."

"'Ah me! what is the matter?' meekly inquired his lordship.

"Everything is the matter with a broken-hearted mother of low-minded offspring,' she answered hotly..." Henry Edward Ludlow Gifford, son of my strength, idealized remain of my inert husband, who at this moment invisibly offers the scourging whip of fatherly authority to your backbone of resentment (though for years you think him dead to your movements) and pillar of maternal trust."

Poor Lady Gifford! her son's behaviour was her undoing. The shock caused her to lose first her reason and then her life. Her son was heart-broken at the thought that he was responsible for her downfall:

"Is it true, O Death," I cried in my agony, "that you have wrested from me my mother, Lady Gifford of Columba Castle, and left me here a young lady figuring on the blackboard of those that they the shalay surface of the present and fileke field of the future to track my life-steps, with gross indifference to her wished-for wish?"

"Blind she lay to the presence of her son, who charged her death-gun with the powder of accumulated wrath."

It is impossible to suppose that Mrs. Ros can ever have read Euphues or the earlier novels of Robert Green. How then shall we account for the extraordinary resemblance to Euphues of her style? how explain those rich alliterations, those elaborate "kennings" and circumlocutions of which the fabric of her book is woven?

Take away from Lyly his erudition and his passion for antithesis, and you have Mrs. Ros. Delina is own sister to Euphues and Pandosto. The fact is that Mrs. Ros happens, though separated from Euphues by three hundred years and more, to have arrived independently at precisely the same stage of development as Lyly and his disciples. It is possible to see in a growing child a picture in miniature of all the phases through which humanity has passed in its development. And, in the same way, the mind of an individual (especially when that individual has been isolated from the main current of contemporary thought) may climb, alone, to a point at which, in the past, a whole generation has rested. In Mrs. Ros we see, as we see in the Elizabethan novelists, the result of the discovery of art by an unsofisticated mind and its conscious attempt to produce the artistic. It is remarkable how late in the history of civilized literature simplicity is invented. The first attempts of any people to be consciously literary are always productive of the most elaborate artificiality. Poetry is always written before prose and always in a language as remote as possible from the language of ordinary life. The language and versification of "Boewulf" are far more artificial and remote from life than those of, say, "The Rape of the Lock." The Euphuists were not barbarians making their first discovery of literature; they were, on the contrary, highly educated. But in one thing they were unsophisticated; they were discovering prose. They were realizing that prose could be written with art and they wrote it as artificially as they possibly could, just as their Saxon ancestors who thought they had become intoxicated with the discovery of artifice. It was some time before the intoxication wore off and men saw that art was possible without artifice. Mrs. Ros, an Elizabethan born out of her time, is still under the spell of that magical and delicious intoxication.

Mrs. Ros's artifices are often more remarkable and elaborate even than Lyly's. This is how she tells us that Delina earned money by doing needlework.

She tried hard to keep herself a stranger to her poor old father's slight income by the use of the finest production of steel, whose blunt edge eyed the ready covering with marked greed and offered its sharp dart to faultless fabrics of flaxen fineness.

And Lord Gifford parts from Delina in these words:

I am just in time to hear the toll of a parting bell strike its heavy weight of appalling softness against the weakest fibres of a heart of love, arousing and tickling its dormant action, thrusting the dart of evident separation deeper into its tubes of tenderness, and fanning the flame, already unextinguishable, into volumes of burning blaze.

But more often Mrs. Ros does not exceed the bounds which Lyly set for himself. Here, for instance, is a sentence that might have come direct out of Euphues:

"Two days after, she quit Columba Castle and resolved to enter the holy cloisters of a convent, where, she believed she'd be dead to the business of worldly wealth, the crocking of worldly distinction, and the designing creases [sic] in the muddy stream of love."

Or again, this description of the artful charmers who flout along the streets of London is written in the very spirit and language of Euphues:

"Their hair was a light-golden colour, thickly fringed in front, hiding in many cases the furrows of a life of vice; behind, reared coals, some of which differed in hue, exhibiting that they were on patrol for the price of another supply of dye. . . . The elegance of their attire had the glow of robbery—the rustle of many a lady's silent curse. These tools of brazen effrontery were strangers to the blush of innocence that tinged a many cheek, as they would gather round some of God's ordained, praying in flowery words of decaying Cockney, that they should break their holy vows by accompanying them to the halls of adultery. Nothing daunted at such a different division, their talk was interrupted by their bold assertion of loathsome rights, they moved on, while laughters of hidden rage and defeat flitted across their droll-decked faces, to die as they next accosted some rustic-looking creature. Their tempting were their polished twang, their earnest advances, their pitiful entreaties, yielded, in their ignorance of the ways of a large city, to their glibby offers, and accompanied, with slight hesitation, these artificial sheds of immorality to their homes of ruin, degradation and shame."

AUTOLYCUS.

We have tried to form the habit of beginning these notes while the past week's ATHENÆUM is at press. These words are therefore written on June 2. In every sense a dies mirabilis. Perfect weather, Derby Day, Mr. Hardy's birthday, the news that Mr. Charles Garvice left over £70,000. And while these things are soothing in our minds, there is an undercurrent of impatience to know the winner of the Derby. Spion Kop! And we were given that horse by an unknown fellow-traveller in a railway carriage on Whit-Monday, 100 to 6 against! It might have been a dies mirabilissimus; and we might have laid the foundations of a fortune to rival Mr. Garvice's.

This is not literary gossip. Far from it. But what is a man doing in an office on a perfect Derby Day which is also Mr. Hardy's birthday? Literary gossip is inhuman. We ought to know how many times the Derby has been mentioned in literature, how many novel heroes have backed the winner. We know neither of these things. Why on earth did not Dickens write of Derby Day? He and he alone could have done justice to the national festival of Epson. Surely he would not have missed the opportunity of rising to the height of this unique Derby Day of 1920: a concentration of national institutions, among which we reckon not only Mr. Hardy, but Mr. Garvice also (above all with £70,000).

In any case the way the literary gossip is hard in England. Paris is a seething cauldron of literary rumour compared with London. For instance, we take up two of the current French reviews. In one we find the answers of some thirty eminent literary men to the impertinent (yet intriguing) question, 'Why do you write?' In the other, the answers of as many more to the puzzling query, 'Why no great French poet comes from the French Midi?' In these answers there is the stuff of a bookful of gossip.

One question, however, occurs to us. How many English poets of the distinction of the Comtesse de Noailles would be so charming as to reply to the impertinent question with this delightful verse?

J'écrit parce que le jour où je ne serai plus
On sait comme l'air et le plaisir m'ont plu
Et que mon livre porte à la foule future
Comme j'aimais la vie et l'heureuse nature.

And we should not like to omit the laconic answer of Knut Hamsun, whose masterly work is in process of being made familiar to English readers: 'I write to shorten time.'

One of the most practicable of the remedies or mitigations for the continual increase in the price of books is to publish them in paper covers. The other day we had in our hands a publisher's estimate of costs for an edition of 2,000 copies of a book. The total cost of printing and binding was £230. The binding amounted to £90. The proportion is enormous, and out of all relation to the actual value of the binding to the book-reader. At least sixpence a copy could be saved by the use of paper covers. We invite our readers' opinions on this question. At present librarians, booksellers and publishers are of opinion that the public will not buy unbound books. Frankly, we find it hard to believe that the public is so stupid.

But, of course, paper is the real trouble. We dislike the present habit of authors, when they foregather to air their grievances, of treating the printer as the chief culprit. On the whole, the rise in wages in the printing trade is reasonable; printers need a living wage as much as authors, and they have as good a right to it. The villain of the piece is the pulp-merchant, and the present price of paper may, without exaggeration, be called a menace to civilization. We think it extremely regrettable that authors should, by their careless language, lead the printer to believe that they are his natural enemies.

The current number of the Bookshelf, which is the house organ of Messrs. Chapman & Hall, is distinguished by some well-written literary notes on a very actual question, the temptation of the modern novelist to overwrite. Perhaps it is rather a necessity than a temptation. The most notable, to our sense, of Messrs. Chapman & Hall's announcements is a novel by Mr. Norman Douglas, called 'They Went,' which is due to appear in August. The title leaves room for the imagination even when we are told that it is 'a story of a medieval city.' Mr. Douglas is a writer of genuine distinction; and we are glad to see that a second edition of his delightful 'Old Calabria' has been published by Mr. Secker at half-a-guinea.

To-day Mr. Grant Richards issues a second edition of 'George Meredith: His Life and Friends in Relation to his work,' by Mr. S. M. Ellis. This book is of real interest, and hero-worshippers of the novelist found it very disconcerting. For ourselves, we like disconcerting books, and in our opinion Mr. Ellis's work supplies an explanation of a number of literary problems and misgivings which beset the reader of Meredith's novels when his youthful enthusiasm begins to wear thin. If our memory serves us the first edition of this book was the subject of a legal injunction; and we presume that the second edition has been to some extent rewritten.

There are publishers and publishers; but there is only one Oxford University Press. When we look at the shelves which contain our most precious books, we cannot help being aware that almost every other one bears the Oxford imprint. The distinction of the lettering, if nothing else, will catch the eye. And now on our desk we have yet another of the remarkable volumes which endeavour the lettering and the imprint to us. 'English Madrigal Verse, 1588-1632,' edited from the original song-books by Mr. E. H. Fellowes, is an exquisite book of 640 pages, half for the madrigalists and half for the lutenists. It goes without saying that anyone who can afford 12s. 6d. should buy it: it is a possession for ever.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The 9th and final portion of the Huth collection will be disposed of on the 22nd to 25th of June, by Messrs. Sotheby. This portion consists of the works catalogued under W-Z, with a short appendix. Providence has not allotted any of the great names of English literature to this section—Isaac Walton, Whetstone, Wycliffe, Wither, Wotton and Wycherley are about the most striking to be found. It is, however, fairly rich in English music of the best period. Thus we have John Ward's First Set of English Madrigals (1613), Watson's First Set of Italian Madrigals (1590) including two by Bird, Thomas Weelkes Madrigals (1587), his second volume of 1600, his Ballads and Madrigals of 1608, and his Ayres or Phantasie Spirits of the same year, Wilby's First Set of English Madrigals (1598) and his second set (1609), John Wilson's Cheerful Ayres (Oxford, 1660), the first music book printed at Oxford, Yonge's Musica Transalpina of 1688 and the second book of 1587, and an extraordinary rare 'Trattato Vulgar de Canto' of Francesco Caccia' printed at Milan in 1482.

There are a large number of 17th century plays, two of the volumes with collections of plays were evidently bound by Morane for Charles II. Among the books, of which only one copy is known or available for sale is Willibowis's Avisa and Cooke's Deponente's Complaint, an attack on Ayre, a unique copy bound on Avisa, a unique copy of the Minstrel's Life of Wallace, Warner's Syrinx, The Nuncerie of Names, a Caxton of 1477, and a volume of Martin Marprelate tracts, extremely rare but not the rarest. An illustrated catalogue (price 10s. 6d.) may be had.

A MARVELLOUS EVENT

In reading Mr. H. G. Wells' very interesting "Outline of History" we have discovered that our appetite for the marvellous has diminished very little from our boyhood days. We are not yet so scientific as to be interested in each fact merely as an example of some general law; if the fact be sufficiently striking we can still, with round-eyed wonder, delight in it for its own sake. We have been, like all the world, enraptured by the discoveries at Knossus, but perhaps our imagination is even more stirred, in a different way, by the marvels of the prehistoric period. The greatest storm of the giant reptiles is curiously exciting, and, going farther back still, we have been tempted to linger over that period of the earth's history which preceded the formation of a solid crust. This period was the Storm Age of the world. We cannot really imagine those ages of volcanic outbreaks which would blow out an area the size of Europe, nor those gigantic hailstorms of molten metal—Mr. Conrad's "Typhoon" is, perhaps, as far as our imagination can effectively go—but we can enjoy them in a (perhaps slightly unintelligent) spirit of wonder. The greatest storms and eruptions occur, of course, in the sun. Masses of flaming gas have been seen to rush up from the surface of the sun to a height of half-a-million miles, travelling with a velocity of hundreds of miles a second. And if the eruption theory of the origin of craters on the moon be correct, that dead body has known some stirring times, for several of the craters are fifty to sixty miles in diameter and even more. But although we pass our days in comparatively monotonous and quiescent surroundings, although Mr. Conrad's "Typhoon" is, cosmically speaking, a description of an almost imperceptible draught, yet even in modern times our earth has given a display which is a faint indication of what it was capable of in its youth. We refer to the famous eruption of Krakatoa, which startled the Royal Society into appointing a Committee of investigation which produced a quarto volume of 500 pages devoted to this one eruption.

The eruption on Krakatoa, a small island in the Straits of Sunda, is usually dated from one o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, August 26, 1883. But the early stages began on May 20, sufficiently stimulating, without being terrifying, to attract a pleasure excursion from Batavia. The party found a basin-shaped crater, about half-a-mile wide and about 150 feet deep. In the centre was a large aperture from which steam issued with a terrific noise. By the end of June other craters had opened on the island and the volcanic energy steadily increased. By August 26, Krakatoa began to erupt seriously. Detonations, which were heard 100 miles away, succeeded one another at intervals of about ten minutes. The column of steam, smoke and ashes, as measured from a distant ship, was estimated to be seventeen miles high. The eruptions steadily became louder, until by midnight the inhabitants of a town 100 miles distant were unable to sleep, for the noise resembled artillery being fired at their very doors, and the windows kept up a loud rattling. It was not until 10 a.m. on the Monday morning, however, that the eruption reached its culmination. This was heard as four terrific explosions, of which the third was by far the loudest. This explosion was heard 3,000 miles away. At several points within this radius the alarming and inexplicable noises caused the authorities to send out ships to ascertain their cause. At Daly Waters, in South Australia, the inhabitants were awakened from sleep by the noise of Krakatoa, distant over 2,000 miles. At the distance of 3,000 miles the explosions resembled the distant roar of heavy guns. The great sea-waves that accompanied the eruption still had the very perceptible height of eighteen inches after travelling more than 5,000 miles. On the shores of the Straits of Sunda the waves reached a height of more than seventy feet, while at Sumatra a man-of-war was carried nearly two miles inland and left high and dry thirty feet above sea level.

The quantity of material shot into the air was naturally tremendous; at Sumatra the clouds of dust produced a greater degree of darkness, at 10 a.m., than had been known on the blackest nights. These clouds entered the region of the high winds and were swept along with a velocity of about 76 miles per hour. In three days they crossed the Indian Ocean and then passed over Equatorial Africa. They continued over the Atlantic, Brazil and the Pacific, returning to Krakatoa only a year later. A certain amount of dust had settled by this time, but the great bulk of it started off again on its journey round the earth. Month after month these tours of the globe continued, the dust-clouds manifesting their presence by imparting a strange blue hue to the sun, turning the moon blue or green, and by creating remarkable and glorious twilights.

But perhaps the most interesting feature of the eruption consists in the remarkable train of air waves that was sent out from Krakatoa. It can be shown, mathematically, that if a sufficiently intense air wave be sent out from a point in the air envelope surrounding the surface of a sphere, it will at first diverge and then converge till it reaches a point at the opposite end of the sphere passing through the origin. From this point it will again diverge, to converge ultimately at the origin, when the whole cycle may be repeated. Now barometric measurements all over the world enabled the great air wave from Krakatoa to be traced to its antipodes, a spot in Central America, and back again. A second, third and fourth journey were traced on upwards of forty instruments. In addition, a fifth, sixth and seventh journey was traced by some instruments, notably those at Kew. The time taken for the double journey, one complete cycle from and to Krakatoa, was found to be about 37 hours. Allowing for the different temperatures of the regions traversed by the waves—for they crossed, of course, the north and south poles—this works out at about the velocity of ordinary sound waves. This is the only recorded instance of an air wave so great that the atmosphere of the entire globe takes part in it.

There are, of course, many scientific lessons to be drawn from the Krakatoa eruption; we have been content, however, to abstain from all improving reflections and to present it merely as one of the marvels of the world.

EGYPT EXPLORATION.—May 28.—Professor B. P. Grenfell delivered a lecture on "The Present Position of Papyrology." After the conquest of Egypt by Alexander the Great, Greek became the official language for nearly a thousand years. Records of this period are to be found in the papyri fragments still preserved, in inscriptions on monuments and on mummy cartonnage. A systematic search for papyri was started about 1885 by Professors Grenfell and Hunt, who practically had the field to themselves at that time. Papyri were then found in the town ruins, in tombs and in the rubbish heaps near the Nile. A few of various nations to obtain Greek papyri during the last few years Great Britain has secured the largest share of the prizes. The chief collectors in this country are in the British Museum, the Bodleian Museum at Oxford, the Rylands Museum at Manchester, and in

THE LAST WORKS OF RENOIR

A few critics and a good many dealers have circulated the report that in his last years Renoir never did anything comparable to those works of his prime which earned him a supreme place among the artists of our time. A circumstance which lent colour to this opinion was that he was known to have been, more or less, crippled by rheumatism for many years before the end. A visit to his house at Cagnes which I was enabled to make by the kindness of his son, M. Jean Renoir, convinced me of the incorrectness of this view. The pictures which remain there represent the results of what are ordinarily called his "declining years" and surely there was never so surprising an efflorescence of creative power as is there displayed. I doubt whether even Titian or Rembrandt, who both attained maturity at fifty, made such amazing progress at the very end of their lives as Renoir did in his last decade. With the cunning which comes of a lifelong application to a single pursuit he actually found how to turn his physical disability into an advantage for his art. Subtlety and finesse of drawing being denied to him, he was bound to conceive his forms with such amplitude, such simplicity of contour as his crippled hand could still express readily. This is, of course, in line with the ultimate development of all great art. A forced and schematic simplicity is a disastrous pitfall, but the synthesis which comes from long familiarity with the varieties and intricacies of form is the last perfection of art. Renoir would no doubt have attained to this in any case. He was tending towards it throughout his career, but in the end he was forced to make the step more completely and more whole-heartedly than any other modern artist.

Renoir's attitude to life was too simple, his enjoyment was too direct and immediate to force him to any curious investigations into the possibilities of design. He had none of the passion of a Poussin or a Cézanne for unforeseen architectural possibilities. With him, sensation always predominated over the reflective faculties. So that, he was always a superb painter, he was, for the most part, not a great or original designer. That is to say that while his design was always extremely competent, well balanced and adequate, it was not by his disposition of the masses, and their relative proportion, that he most excited the imagination. By a natural inclination he adopted the simplest possible relations of plastic masses, namely, that of a bas-relief. Each mass is so modelled that the highest light tends to fall on the most prominent part, and the receding planes retire not to infinity but only, as it were, to the common plane from which all the masses emerge. His latest work has only followed the tendency to simplify the plastic relief, the tendency to simplify the plastic relief is even more marked than before, but more than this, with the growing necessity for simplification of contour there followed, inevitably, a great amplification of all the forms, and the whole design tends to be filled with a very few prominent masses. And these masses are disposed with such perfect understanding of their relations to the picture space, that in the end Renoir became what he had scarcely ever been before—a great and original designer. As examples of this, one may cite the two superb seated nudes seen from the back with their heads slightly turned towards the spectators, which are reproduced in M. André's book on Renoir. I doubt whether painting has ever gone beyond this point in the realization of plastic relief, and this without any loss of the fullest possible intensity of colour; for to Renoir, as to Cézanne, relief was to be attained not by degradations and negations of colour, but solely by the perfect apprehension of the differing colour sensations of the various planes.

The last great composition which Renoir executed was a very large canvas with two nude women reclining in a sunlit landscape. The rhythm of the two figures is perfectly harmonized, and the modelling of the forms is pushed to its utmost limits with an audacity which is almost startling. It has a plentitude of life and a voluptuous richness which Rubens might have envied.

There is also a composition of "Baigneuses" in which Renoir has taken up again, and with fuller power than ever before, a subject which had always haunted his imagination. And here the interwoven sequences of limbs and torsos fill the whole composition. So masterly is the design of this melée of nude forms that without any sense of crowding every part of the surface seems drawn into the general movement; every touch contributes to the plastic enrichment of the design. And here perhaps more than elsewhere Renoir's colour attains its completest and richest expression. Like so many of the primitives he worked by preference at the red end of the spectrum—in his extremely limited palette he found room for two different kinds of vermilion—and this composition seems to attain to undreamt-of intensities of red and yellow.
It starts as if it were where Rubens left off and finds its and more resonant chord of the highest, the most penetrating notes of the scale. But this is attained by the subtility of the transitions and not by a brutal display of positive colour. Thus the intense brilliance of the yellows in this, as in all Renoir's recent work, is obtained without the use of any brighter colour than Naples yellow.

Renoir belonged to the European tradition of the Renaissance: he had not felt the wave of Oriental influence which affected so deeply his younger colleagues.
Colour with him is colour as it was understood by Rubens, by Rembrandt even, and most of all by Watteau. That is to say that though he has purified and intensified the notes, the effect aimed at is of an enveloping atmosphere of colour—through which and by which all the forms are revealed. He had no use for that Oriental, primitive and quite modern conception of the direct opposition of masses of more or less uniform colour. In his technique, too, Renoir ranged himself beside the old masters. It is t rue that he never adopted the deliberately planned approach and systematic execution of a Rubens. His system allowed room for the inspiration of the moment and in this he came very close to Watteau, who at a time when the rules of technique were more rigidly fixed was regarded as casual and unsystematic.
Like Watteau, too, he felt his way round the forms by innumerable small strokes of colour. He had an empalement, generally of pure white, which subsequent touches would veil and modify. In general he used so much medium that the colour was transparent or opalescent. It is no doubt this method of using paint almost transparently, like a water-colour, on a white ground which gives his pictures their extraordinary brilliance and luminosity. But this is also due to the fact that he used his colours almost pure, the intermediate tones and transitions being more the result of superpositions on the canvas than of previous mixture on the palette.
The final development of this method was, no doubt, dictated partly by Renoir's physical disabilities. The method of feeling round the modelling by unnumbered touches, one of which need be absolutely decisive and final, eliminated the necessity for exact skill of handling. On the other hand it was a method which put all possible strain upon his sensibility. Only in the hands of an artist, as learned in sensation as Renoir was, would it be possible to create so full an illusion of mass and relief by a method which tends to leave the forms merely suggested and indicated.

Few artists have ever been as fortunate as Renoir.
His temperament left him enough points of contact with the ordinary man for his work to be accepted when that of all his colleagues was still taboo. He was never recondite or abstract or peculiar in any way.
He had the most normal, the most healthy appetite for life, and he had the extraordinary gift of communicating his own joy in life, so directly and simply, that the ordinary man could take pleasure in works which the most exclusive aesthete was also forced to accept. By an extraordinary conjunction of circumstances Renoir realized amid the full blast of nineteenth-century commercialism the ideal conditions of the artist of the eighteenth century. It was this that made him so marked an exception, that gave him an ease and assurance in all that he did which is unlike the general tone of modern art.

Academic critics of the last generation who described English Impressionist pictures as "mere sketches" were, certainly, perfectly right. For the majority of English Impressionists (and of Glasgow Impressionists also) who came after Whistler cast aside the remnant of compositional discipline retained by the French pioneers, and it is this freedom of the last hundredweight of ballast which makes the English pictures appear so volatile and unstable.
We have but to compare Mr. Algernon Talmage's pictures with those of Camille Pissarro (at the Leicester Galleries) to realize that although no critic with any personal experience of painting could possibly call Pissarro's pictures sketchy, he might perfectly well apply the term to the Englishman's work at the Fine Art Society. "Sketchy" is, in fact, the term which we should apply ourselves to Mr. Talmage's work.
But we do not apply it as a term of reproach. An artist has, after all, a perfect right to spend his life making sketches if he feels no impulse towards more important achievement.

Mr. A. J. Munnings is another Impressionist who limits the field of his endeavour—one might almost say of his relaxation, so evident is it that he regards painting as a jolly pastime for which he happens to have talent. He has clearly enjoyed painting the sketches now collected at Messrs.
Connell's Gallery. He has delighted in the holiday-finery of fortune-tye and satin; and the garish and garishness of English women's costumes rendered subtle and beautiful by the cold English light.
The more successful of these sketches are much finer in tone and colour than Mr. Manning's exhibits at the Academy and they are all full of vigour and dexterous painting.

The most important of the Bulkeley family portraits, now exhibited for the first time, are the full length portraits by Reynolds of Lady Jane Warren (who sat in 1758) and Lady Frances Warren (whose picture is dated 1759). There is something concerting in the colour of the draperies in these pictures.
Reynolds was admitted a crude colourist, but at this period he was still capable of delicate passages like the wreath of flowers in the hand of lady Jane and it is difficult to believe that he was responsible for the obvious pinkness of the pink dress in the first picture, and obvious blueness of the blue dress in the second. Possibly, as he was very busy at this time (he painted 120 portraits in 1769), he handed the imparto underpaintings of the gowns to Peter Toms or to Madox Brown. The Italian, with instructions to mix "imparto colour.
Or possibly—and we fear more probably—a recent restorer has interpreted a commission to clean and varnish as a general injunction to brighten up the Colours. Be this as it may, the pictures are very handsome examples of Reynolds at a good period and the elaborate underpaintings, at any rate, are unroughed. The Romney portrait of The Hon. Viscount Bulkeley, which hangs between them, done at Rome in 1773, contains some excellent painting.
Music

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA

We are generally supposed to be taking part in a Renaissance of English music, and it is amusing to note that this new Renaissance, like its more famous predecessor shows signs of a Schneemelch for "the glorious antique." Just as Michael Angelo and the rest dug up and restored the statues and the buildings of old Rome, sticking truckless heads on to headless trunks, scraping and polishing, jumbling together Greek originals and bad Roman imitations, decorating drawing-rooms with haphazard fragments of tomb-reliefs and inscriptions, so we are now exhuming the music of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, English, French or Italian, hacking it about, rescoring it, putting it on the stage in a baroque frenzy of convulsive antiquarianism. The scholars have sown the wind; the conductors and stage-producers are reaping the whirlwind.

"The Beggar's Opera," when it was first produced was intended to be a satire on the Italian opera of the nobility and gentry. For nearly two centuries it had been "among the Otamys at Surgeons' Hall." Last Saturday the corpse was dressed up and galvanized into life by Mr. Lovat Fraser, Mr. Frederick Austin and Mr. Nigel Playfair. But what we want to-day is not so much the old "Beggar's Opera," delightful though the entertainment is, as a new one. It should be a satire not upon Buononcini and Ariosti, but on Charpentier and Puccini. The original is in the same case as the comic operas of Gilbert and Sullivan. The world has forgotten what they were designed to satirize, it has even forgotten that they were intended to be satirical. It finds the dialogue unintelligible and the music just quaint and charming. Gilbert requires as many explanatory notes as Aristophanes and Gay is in the same case. If the present production of "The Beggar's Opera" is satirical, it is a satire on the over-dressed, over-produced and over-orchestrated revivals of old plays and operas. Mr. Fraser's scenery and costumes are an amusing skit on those of Mr. Norman Wilkinson and Mr. Hugo Rumbold. Mr. Austin's re-arrangement of the music recognizes the uselessness of scolding at Handel and turns the laugh against Mr. Cecil Sharp, Mr. Cyril Scott and Mr. Roger Quilter. Mr. Playfair's share in the entertainment is the most brilliant of all, for he has the courage of the supreme artist, like Swinburne in the "Heptameron" and caricatures, as no one else could have done, those methods of production which are peculiarly his own. The Newgate Company, with two exceptions, keep the treadmill buzzing; it is the assured exaggeration of that industrious energy which so often distinguishes the comedians of the Beecham's opera. Such colossal efforts to be funny, such complete absence of humour! It is, indeed, the fine flower of irony, for it shaves the very verge of intolerable tediousness with a precision of which only the most accomplished artists are capable.

And then, just as a disturbing hint of another point of view, an uncomfortable suggestion of what "The Beggar's Opera" just possibly did really look like in 1728, there are those two exceptions, Mr. Ranalow as Machaeth and Miss Sylvia Nells as Polly. Miss Nells, most adorable of nuns, walks through the part with the simplicity of a child. People say she cannot act. Thank goodness! Mr. Ranalow is hardly to be called native, but he is direct and straightforward. He sings his songs without fuss, as if they had just come into his head. Machaeth, and indeed all the other singing characters of the opera, are treated by their poet in much the same way as Old Merryminded in "The Knight of the Burning Pestle."
Mr. Ranalow was the only singer who realized this. Either the songs must be a deliberate caricature of the Handelian opera or they must be trolled out spontaneously as if they had no accompaniment; if not, the music is a perpetual nuisance to a very amusing play. Mr. Ranalow, to judge from his acting, does appear to think that the play is quite amusing as it stands. But it is the sad fact that some people think the music charming and the play tedious. However, there is the advantage of the Hammersmith production—it is "so full of a number of things" that there are sure to be some to please everybody.

"La Traviata"

Those who profess contempt for "La Traviata" have in most cases either never heard it performed properly or never heard it at all. It shares with "Lucia di Cammmormo" the honour of representing the lowest depth to which opera has ever sunk in the opinion of most serious-minded English and German opera-goers, even of those who are ready to concede quite a sincere admiration to most of the works of Verdi. In Italy both operas are still popular. They are, both of them, or have the reputation of being, prima donna's operas; that accounts both for their popularity and their disrepute. Certainly I have seen performances of "La Traviata" both in Germany and at Covent Garden in the old days, which would justify the extreme contempt of the devout Wagnerites. "I go to see 'Traviata' when I will have a good laugh," said an old German musician to me once. I repeated the remark to an Italian friend. He said quite seriously that "La Traviata" was an opera to move not laughter but tears, and I realized what "La Traviata" meant to him when I saw Gemma Bellincioni in it.

The first production of the opera at Venice, in 1853, was a complete failure. The most obvious reason of the failure was the appearance of the prima donna, which was anything but consumptive. Some people were shocked at the story, and very probably there were many who were shocked at the presentation of opera in contemporary costume. It was the first time in the history of music that an opera had been produced dealing with a tragedy of contemporary life. When the opera recovered its position and became popular it was always acted in the costume of an earlier period, only a curious tradition allowed the heroine to play her part in modern dress. Thus we might see Melba in a smart Parisian gown alongside of Caruso in the costume of Charles I. At the "Old Vic," where they have a first-rate Violetta in Miss Muriel Gough, the rest of the company wear eighteenth-century clothes. To dress the whole opera in the costumes of the present day required more courage than most managers possessed. The prima donna might wear what she pleased, but what tenor could be expected to look romantic in evening dress? Still more courage would have been required to dress the opera in the style of its original period, at any rate in those Wagnerian days of twenty years ago.

Gemma Bellincioni stopped short of a crinoline, but went as near to it as she dared. That was at Palermo, about 1905. Palermo always did its operas on a sumptuous scale, and even the chorus members wore full dress. Gemma Bellincioni was, and no doubt is still, a woman of singularly distinguished beauty of face and figure. Her voice had begun to lose its freshness; but she had that fine sense of style which lasts almost for ever, and she was above all things a great actress. Her peculiar type of beauty was ideally suited to a Winterhalter make-up. She was, in Verdi's own opinion, the one and only Traviata, and it was always her best part.

To-day the crinoline is in fashion again, at any rate on the stage. On Saturday night "La Traviata" was given at Covent Garden in the complete "Book of Beauty" style, with Signorina Pareto as Violetta. She is very far from being a second Bellincioni, but she appears to have taken her for a model and it is certainly a long time since Covent Garden has seen a Traviata of such exquisite appearance and so charming a personality. Her singing is always a delight to the ear, but she lacks the vivacity and brilliance which are required for the first act. In the pathetic parts she was admirable, but she entirely failed to seize the opportunity of that tremendous outburst of feeling in the second act—"Amami, Alfredo." By far the most interesting character on the stage was Alfredo himself. His most personal performances of the opera were, Alfredo is a tenor and nothing more. Signor Marcello Govoni was indeed a tenor and a very agreeable one too; but he also gave us an Alfredo which was a complete and elaborate piece of character-study. His first appearance made a decisive point, for he wore an exaggeratedly dandified costume with a frilled shirt and ruffles at his wrists. He made Alfredo very young and very foolish; a man of affectations both in dress and in behaviour. It was his extreme youth and ignorance of the world, one saw at once, that made Violetta fall in love with him. This conception of Alfredo made the later acts all perfectly plausible—the collapse of the second act, the anger and the abominable behaviour of the third, the futile repentance of the last. His extreme youth is his one and only excuse: an Alfredo of mature years is perfectly unendurable. Signor Govoni knows, too, how to express character in actual singing. He can be affected when the part requires it and serious too. He made the part of Alfredo at every moment intensely interesting, and there could never be any doubt that Verdi's sometimes richly and sentimental tunes, as he sang them, were the true expression of a real personality.

Mlle. Bérat, needless to say, made the tiny part of Annina the servant, stand out vividly with a few masterly touches. Her momentary expression of surprise and shock when Violetta gives her the letter to Baron Duphol to post summed up the whole situation. M. Dinhilly, an old Germont, was only up to Covent Garden standards. He has a very commanding presence and a masterful style of singing by means of which he holds the stage whenever he comes on. He was suitably deferential in the duet with Violetta, but otherwise he seemed to be very much bored with the whole opera. There are few singers who can do justice to "Di Provenza il mar." Most Germonts make it into a very silly tune, some into a vulgar one. In this case it was merely tedious. But old Germont is not a mere conventional heavy father. Verdi understood what he was about when he wrote that song. It gives exactly, or ought to give, the note of tenderness just tinged with reproach which is wanted at the moment. It makes the old man's indignation at the end of the third act all the more dramatic by contrast, and it prepares the way for the reconciliation of the last. But Mr. Dinhilly was so restless during that part of the death-bed scene in which he had to stand in the background that one would hardly have been surprised to see him pull out his watch.

The opera had evidently had little rehearsal. The ensembles were very shaky and the chorus at their worst. Signor Bavagnoli kept things together somehow, but his style of conducting is much too violent for "La Traviata." It is the Italian tradition to be violent in Verdi, and Italian traditions are enforced. One might as well disregard the English traditions of oratorios. Still, in this country there is no particular need to be traditional in opera. It is the one compensation for our neglect of it. We have practically no tradition, and if managers and conductors and producers would take the trouble we might start fresh from the beginning with every opera and interpret it in the way best suited to the audience and the age. If “La Traviata” was studied and rehearsed de novo with as much care in every detail as if it were an entirely new opera it might be recognized by the intellectuals, as it has always been recognized by the occupants of Italian pits and galleries, as a delicate and sensitive study of human feeling.

EDWARD J. DENT

THE GLASTONBURY PLAYERS

It is strange that our London impresarios, for all their professed eagerness to discover an English opera that is really worth producing, should not have hit upon “The Immortal Hour,” and that the first performance of this work should have been given by a handful of local enthusiasts from Glastonbury, whose technical standard, for the most part, fell far short of its requirements, which are not unduly exacting. For “The Immortal Hour” is worth doing well; it is, in spite of some inequalities, a work of real beauty. Its story is based on a Celtic myth that has obvious affinities with the Orpheus-legend. Etain, a fairy maiden, strays from her own folk into a wood, whither she is followed by King Eochaidh, who, thanks to the intervention of Dalua, persuades her to return home. (Dalua is the spirit of suffering and death that is imminent in all human affairs.) At a festival, held to commemorate the first anniversary of their marriage, both are filled with strange presentiments of what is to come; after a time Midir, a prince of her own people, enters to re-claim her; as he does so, Dalua confronts Eochaidh once more, and the curtain falls over his body, whilst from outside are heard the reeding notes of the fairy chorus that is escorting Etain back to her Land of Heart’s Desire. This makes a very fine ending indeed; in the contrast between the desolation of the earthly king on the stage and the light and joy suggested by the fairy voices outside, Mr. Boughton has seized on what is quintessential in the legend, and in his music he manages somehow to embody and crystallize it.

All this last scene is most imaginatively conceived, but for its realization it needs much more skilful handling than it received on this occasion. In particular it needs much more than mere singing; to find the right gesture is imperative, and this is just what everyone concerned entirely failed to do. Mr. Johnstone Douglas fumbled and staggered about in the vaguest and most unconvinning manner; Mr. Arthur Jordan struck the attitude of a Heldentenor, manifestly embarrassed by his arms and hands; Mr. Clive Carey’s unexpected rush at his victim suggested an exciting tackle by a competent three-quarter back rather than the sudden sinister presence of an implacable destiny. And the singing of the chorus behind the scenes was anything but theatrical. Through all this the composer’s intention managed to struggle somehow, but it was a hard, not to say an unfair struggle.

The rest of the opera is not uniformly this level, but a good deal of it is. Some of the most attractive music is heard in the first act, although the opening scene might well be shortened a little. Its import is obscure; the sense of the words does not come across at all clearly, and the synopsis does little to enlighten the audience. The laconic statement that “Dalua, the Shadow that lies behind life, encounters voices in the wood” is hardly an elucidation of what one sees on the stage. The second scene is equally fine from a purely musical point of view, and more convincing as a whole (except for the half-plucked fowl), which strikes an utterly incongruous note of realism, and should be suppressed. It is the festival scene at the opening of the second act that is most open to criticism; the ballet is conventionally designed, and the music a long way below the composer’s best level. That level is sufficiently high to leave one in no doubt (judging Mr. Boughton on a single hearing of this one work alone, and a bad performance at that) that he is amongst the half-dozen best composers we have got in this country. His style is quite straightforward, and quite individual. His score is full of picturesque suggestion, but he almost always succeeds in being picturesque in his own way, and not in the conventional operatic way. Clear rhythmical and melodic definition is the foundation of it all; a good foundation at all times, and particularly needful when you are working on a book by the late Fiona McLeod, whose gifts hardly included that of intellectual precision.

The rest of the Glastonbury performances impose on a critic the painful necessity of saying that in dancing and singing alike the standard of execution fell lamentably below the intentions of the dancers and the singers, which no doubt were excellent. The technique was so poor, the general style so graceless and clumsy that one is bound to express surprise that they should have submitted to the ordeal of a public performance in London. It is plain that Mr. Boughton was misled by some rather foolish Press notices which appeared after the Easter Festival this year, and which should have been taken in a complimentary sense only. In Glastonbury, these players could fairly claim to be judged by a relative standard, and as a rule they have been so judged. Here they have had to face the test of an absolute standard, and they have failed utterly to satisfy it. One noteworthy exception was Miss Laura Wilson’s dance to a Purcell ground. Miss Wilson has a consummate knowledge of how to move, but this only made the helplessness of her colleagues more uncomfortably plain.

The two novelties introduced, Mr. Napier Miles’s choral ballet “Music Comes”—if only she had—and Mrs. Adela Maddison’s “Dance Suite” call for scant notice. The former is too impotent, the latter too immature. Possibly there is a real Adela Maddison, but she is at present submerged in the personality of another composer whom, for brevity’s sake, we call Borokorskireff that her very existence is conjectural. As for the orchestral playing, both in the opera and the ballets, it can only be described as bad. Space at the “Old Vic” is limited, and perhaps it was inevitable that the strings should be hopelessly overbalanced by the brass and wood reinforcements brought in for the occasion. But that is no reason, as far as one can see, why some of these latter gentlemen should have had less than a nothing to do with their parts. One can only hope that subsequent performances will show a sensible reduction in the number of unhearsaunched effects.

R. O. MORRIS.

We have received from Messrs. Schirmer (New York) a copy of the April number of the Musical Quarterly. The two best articles in it are both of the scholarly type—Mr. W. J. Lawrence’s paper on “Music in the Elizabethan Theatre” and M. de St. Fox’s on “Mozart and the Young Beethoven.” Mr. Lawrence knows his subject, and he touches authoritatively on many points connected with it. M. de St. Fox’s theme is familiar, but the writer’s enthusiasm is contagious, and one reads him with real enjoyment. M. Isidor Philipp gives some interesting information about the Paris Conservatoire, and, as regards the number of reminiscences, that unnecessary space is occupied with catalogues of people who have won the first prize for fugue and things of that kind. Also of interest, though far from critical, is Signor Gatti’s paper on Casella. We learn amongst other things that this composer’s work falls into three sharply defined periods. The other articles are all readable, the contributors being Mr. Henry F. Gilbert, Miss Natalie Curtis, Mr. Louis C. Elson, Mr. C. Saerchinger, Mr. Arthur W. Locke, M. Jean Huré, and Mr. Barclay Squire.

BURLESQUE BIOGRAPHIES

THE faults of the Romantics make them fair game for the huntsman, but he should remember that it is a big game he is after. They are lions and lionsesses with a trick of turning on their pursuers. Perhaps the frank invective of a Pierre Lasserre is the best way to assail a Chateaubriand, a Hugo or a Sand. They deserve the compliment of a serious hatred. Satire is a two-edged sword. Jules Lemaître tried it on Chateaubriand. René did not look smaller in consequence, but Lemaître ( alas!) did not look larger. M. Maurras alone has so far combined the strength and wariness required for this chase. In "Les Amants de Venise" he has brought down both Sand and de Musset, but how carefully, how reverentially! His book has the courtesy of a Japanese invitation to harakiri . . . And then to think of what Mr. Moeller has done!

It is not till he has prepared the way by about a hundred pages that M. Maurras allows himself to hint that there is after all a comique supérieur in the Venetian tricorne of which George Sand, Alfred de Musset and Dr. Pantalone Pagello were the points. Mr. Moeller, on the other hand, finds most inferior comedy in the business from the very start and pursues it the length of his three Acts. We simply fail to recognize this George, who cannot even at the gravest crisis speak or hear an effective phrase without scribbling it down at once for copy; who "blarmes" the mothers and fathers of her victims like the adventuress of an old-fashioned Irish novel, and who snares and dismisses her lovers with the cynical detachment—shall we say of a Guity heroine? Not all the painstaking accuracy of detail—not the trowsers, nor the cigars, nor even the famous tea-cup of the revelation scene at Venice—can make her plausible for a single instant. George Sand erred in the main through excess of sincerity; this creature seeks never to be sincere at all. If it was desired to display a suave, elegant and artificial coquetterie it was right to engage Mrs. Patrick Campbell to play the part, since nobody else can hit off such characters with a tithe of her humour and mastery. It is always delightful to watch Mrs. Campbell act, but why drag in George Sand?

The author is a trifle more successful with some of the minor characters. The Alfred de Musset, indeed, is poor, despite Mr. Basil Rathbone's fine performance. We get the absinthe and the nerves without the genius, and to make Alfred abet the amours of George and the Doctor in order to get rid of her is surely false both to the facts and his character. The Paul de Musset, too, is unconvincing. We like Mr. Felix Aylmer's playing of him but do not scent the whimsical translator of Cowper in this "heavy brother." Heine, on the other hand, is possible. Granted that he reserved his best epigrams for his books he may, perhaps, have appeared in society as the sardonic red-haired Mephistophiles that the author and Mr. Frank Cellier make of him. The Chopin, as Mr. Ivan Samson romantically presents him, is tolerable, and the ugly capering little Liszt of Mr. Hector Abbas is probably un-historical but informally plausible. Mr. G. W. Wray makes an impressive, brief appearance as the drunken Cassimir Dudevant, and Mr. Edgar Kent fulfills our wildest dreams as Buloz. Fancy meeting Buloz at las., the ineffable Buloz immortalized on the cover of the Renue des Deux Mondes and between the covers of Veilhott's "Odeurs de Paris"! O Buloz! que nous veut ce flageolet? And what can Mr. Moeller mean by it all?

A TOUCH OF NATURE

STRAND THEATRE.—"Tiger! Tiger!" By Edward Knoblock.

M. KNOBLOCK is to be congratulated. Although a fashionable dramatist and not profoundly an intellectual he has dared to put no more into "Tiger! Tiger!" than a corner of real life. It is a sordid corner in many respects, and also—a fact which has done the author harm with his critics—a corner that makes our common nature seem ridiculous rather than hateful. Yet it is the sort of corner that actually exists, and it was therefore worth while to flash the light on it.

Clive Couper is a rich and clever young man at the start of a parliamentary career. Because he has never felt stirred by Evelyn Greer and the other girls of his class who deal with him on a frankly "man to man" basis, he believes that he is immune from sexual passion. But one soft and windy spring evening he sees a girl waiting at a corner for an omnibus. She is grossly common, but she belongs to a class that cannot afford to play at being desexualized. Clive receives the coup de foudre and, since he kindles the girl as instantaneously as she does him, he is able to bring her straight back into his flat. People don't do these things? We will try to think not; but a great many people are tempted to do them, and that after all is the interesting point.

Once the liaison is made the usual problems start up, old but perennially interesting. Clive has a public life which would not bear the exposure of private vices; he has a friend and mentor representing "the man of the world" in all the Daedonian severity of his code; he has a singularly delicate relationship with Evelyn, in which camaraderie is faintly perturbed by the ardent wish of her dying father that she should marry him. Above all he has to realize in cold daylight all that his Sally is and that she is bound to be, to adjust himself to the crude facts of her nature and upbringing. In all this there are plenty of tests for the author's powers.

Mr. Knoblock, it seems to us, partly succeeds and partly fails in working out his problem. He succeeds especially in the character of Sally. Everything about her is faithfully studied—her enslavement to the instincts of sex and matrinity, her compensating scruples and puritanisms, her frankness, ignorance of these are not shown cynically, nor with the detachment of naturalism. She is given the touch of romance which the story requires. It comes out in the tale of her childhood on the farm with her drunken father and his savage ill-usage of her. It comes out again in the episode of the deaf widower, Sam Tullidge (so delightfully played by Mr. Allan Jeayes), who knows all about her, but worships her with awe, because of her love of his children and other things. There is the gleam of the fairy princess beneath her vulgarity, a sense of mystery and deep-sealed fountains.

Silent is, altogether, less satisfying. There is something absurd in the way he wilts under the discovery that Sally, who comes at night flat in the glass of the mystery of Venus, is by day time a cook. What did he expect? He would not have been blind after the first half-hour to her accent, her coarse hands, her stupidity and want of education. He can hardly have supposed she was a disguised Duchess or a prima ballerina. Yet he is depressed and discouraged by her turning out a cook in a way he would not have been (he rather gives us to understand) if she had turned out a shop-girl. The shock seems even to prick his conscience—perhaps by its suggestion of ever-burning fires. Why is it more dignified to measure calico on a counter than to pop dishes into an oven? Clive, after all he had swallowed, might have taken this pill more manfully, we think.

Again, where precisely does "Tiger! Tiger!" come in? The "tiger" is, we suppose, the fury of lust that sweeps away all competing feelings and principles. But after their first coming together we do not see much of the "tiger" in Sally or in Clive. She adores him with all the idealism of a Garvice heroine; his whole behaviour—including his assertion that she had put meaning into his life and nerved him to fresh ambitions—implies that he found in her a great deal more than the "tiger" could demand. The passion of Frank Ascott for the barmaid, Lizzie Baker, in Mr. George Moore’s "Spring Days" might be the passion of a tiger or a tiger-cat, but this looks like a real love story. It may be that Mr. Leon Quarrtermaine’s rather slight physique prevents him from realizing the part. As Clive was, it seems, one of the "How to win the war" M.P.’s with a gift for hypnotizing mass meetings it is possible that he would succeed, if masculine expression can have place with spontaneity and inevitability, is the form of artistic insincerity that he (or any creative artist suddenly attracted by a social movement) needs most to guard against. The working of Mr. Quarrtermaine’s mind is apparent because it is set down in words in that same preface:

"How many tragic situations did Goethe say were possible? Something like thirty-two. Which seems a lot. Anyhow, granted that men are men still . . . we have added another tragic possibility to the list: the Strike situation. As yet, no one tackles this situation . . . Mr. Galsworthy has a peep, and sank down towards boths.

If Mr. Galsworthy sank towards boths he at least gave us a clear-cut—perhaps too clear-cut—work for the theatre. Mr. Lawrence is never in similar danger; he drifts evenly, without either sinking or rising, from vagueness to vagueness. The atmosphere is of industrial conflict in a Midland colliery village, true enough, but all through the first act it is only by chance words that we gather the deadly nature of it, the opening spectacle of a street orator haranguing the crowd being in no way different from the soap-box propaganda on the most normal of occasions. Having told us everything in his preface, the author has become too certain of himself.

In tragedy, as Mr. Lawrence discerns, the man is more than his part. Hamlet is more than Prince of Denmark, Macbeth more than murderer of Duncan. But there is nothing in Gerald Barlow as the uncompromising employer, in his associates, or in the labour leaders divided against themselves, to distinguish them from any other dramatic character created to fit into a particular argumentative situation. It is in the portrayal of Barlow in conflict with his mother after his discovery of his relationship with a young sculpture in the family’s employ that we are given a “man rather than a part.” For the first time in the play Mr. Lawrence forgets that he is writing for a People’s Theatre, and the scene is the soundest in the play; far sounder, artistically speaking, than the exposition of mob-psychology at the indecisive close, which, though it may please the “people” and prove tremendously effective in the theatre, is a piece of realism degrading to us as readers (and as audience). In art, as in life, there is a definite point in the degradation of a fellow-creature beyond which we cannot go; if only because, as in the instance of Malvolio (Shakespeare’s one excess in our modern eyes), it is humanly impossible to look upon.

Correspondence

MR. WALTER BAYES AND THE ACADEMY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—I would wish to enter a gentle protest against an article (over the signature R. H. W.), in your issue of May 21—not in so far as it concerns myself, whom your contributor describes in terms quite as flattering as are called for, so that I may wisely let well alone, but on behalf of an unknown and imprudent Academician, who is denounced as

By this no invidious comparison is intended, nor any artistic inferiority to Shakespeare implied. The truth is simply that the notion of a People’s Theatre never once came into Shakespeare’s mind. He wrote with no intent to appeal to one particular class of audience rather than to another particular class. The effect was a total absence of that self-consciousness in artistic expression which is fatal to the freedom and independence of art.

We had almost written, fatal to the sincerity of art. For Mr. Lawrence’s play has been composed so specifically for an exclusive audience—exclusive, though that audience be the “people”—that the reader may detect in his choice of subject a deliberateness which, because only the inscrutable and the more formidable animal. In that case Mr. Quarrtermaine’s delicate and finished performance was a little out of place. Yet it seemed to fit in well enough and was a pleasure to watch.

There was, happily, no such doubt about Miss Kyre Bellew’s or Miss Stella Mervyn-Campbell’s interpretations of Sally and Evelyn. We have said so much about Sally that it is, perhaps, only necessary to add that it was Sally embodied in Miss Kyre Bellew that we had in mind. In looks and acting she was exactly what was required. Miss Campbell’s duty was to execute herself and she did it heroically. Evelyn, with her wit and daintiness and gentleness all cold and effaced, an old maid in girlhood, is as clean-cut, though she cannot be as vivid as Sally. The austere little epilogue when the two women meet in Clive’s dismantled room after his death at the front and agree that they are each of them half a being that ought to be united for perfection depends on her, since it is she who does the thinking, and she carried it off without a fault. We only take leave to quarrel with the summung-up which the author puts in her mouth. Sally’s need, she declares, is education, and that is true enough. But her own want, she goes on to say, is temperament, and that seems less certain. Considered as a type is it not education that she too wants, or at least a fresh education? Sally has never learned to tame the tiger, but Evelyn, laying her innocent 20th century manliness on top of the Victorian tradition of repression has unfortunately suffocated him . . . The author of “Joan and Peter” may develop the theme.

MR. D. H. LAWRENCE AND THE "PEOPLE."

TOUCH AND GO: A PLAY IN THREE ACTS. 2\(b\)y D. H. Lawrence.

(Daniel. 3s. 6d. net.)

A NICE phrase: A People’s Theatre. But what about it? . . . Mr. Lawrence’s challenge in his preface to “Touch and Go” is supported in such ironical and ruthless fashion throughout the ninety pages of the volume that it becomes a necessity with us to retort that the idea of a People’s Theatre will remain vital only so long as those who provide its plays know nothing of its existence. While disagreeing entirely—unless it be theoretically—with Mr. Lawrence’s racy disclaimer that such an institution is either in being or on the way to it, that though “the name is chosen, the baby isn’t begotten; nay, the would-be parents aren’t married, nor yet courting,” it would be easy to maintain that, whether a People’s Theatre has been in existence all the time without our being aware, or whether it is indeed an ideal for future realization, William Shakespeare will always have a decided advantage over these writers for the newly-formed Society to which, on the title-leaf of “Touch and Go,” we are all invited to send our manuscripts.
"Impertinent" for claiming the admission of my picture as indicating a tendency to "move with the times."

"Impertinent" in the merely derivative sense clearly does not apply, for the Academy has been attacked for being old-fashioned; so evidence of any sort, to the contrary, could hardly be regarded as other than germane to the discussion. In the more colloquial sense of part or something worthy of respect, how does it apply? To whom has the Academician been impertinent?

At a first reading one would think that R. H. W. considered it was myself, but if this be really so, I must be permitted to claim any sense of being insulted by being written down as an innovator. I am reminded of a charming passage in the "Bees in the Wood," where the little girl (Mr. Will Evans) was accused by her brother of being a flirt. "Oh! I'm not, really I'm not," she says in shocked tones, evidently with truth, but, as evidently saying to herself, "Oh, if only I could make him think I am lying." Somewhat analogous must be the attitude of the conservative artist when accused of Post Impressionism, Futurism, Bolshevism. He may not believe it, but as for feeling hurt—as a man of the world, Mr. Editor, who realizes the attention paid respectively to the revolutionary or the merely "scholarly" artist—pensez vous?

And, indeed, though that is what your contributor artfully so artfully suggests, it he artfully suggests something quite different. He does not think that for a painter to be "scholarly, ingenious and painstaking," avails much, if at the same time he "contributes nothing to the Cézanne or Cubist traditions." His tone suggests that it is to the originality of these artists that the Academician has been impertinent by forcing them up as a confabulating.

But the anonymous sinner said nothing of the sort—indeed, the artist whom the R.A. are most reproached with neglecting, the artist against whom the same charge (of contributing nothing, etc.) might equally lie. The Academician had thus the best of reasons for not regarding the Cézanne and Cubist traditions as for the purposes of the controversy, the only representatives of progress. I submit that it is a maxim of superior criticism that we should try to be just even to Academicians, and that new and old fashions overlap too disastrously for it to amount to impertinence in anyone to differ from current opinions as to what is up to date.

If in the days when Impressionism was the accepted representative of "modernity," the Academy had hung works by the founders of the Cézanne and Cubist traditions, nothing would have been easier than to scout its plea of having moved with the times by demonstrating that these works contributed nothing to the Monet and Sisley tradition. That would have been perfectly true, but it would have been evident that the plea was impertinent. An Academician equally with any other art critic is entitled to his view as to what is progress. If all changes were for the better the early masters would be the worst painters of all. I hope, therefore, to induce R. H. W. to make clear where the alleged impertinence lies or alternatively to admit a slip of the pen.

Yours very truly,

WALTER BAYES.

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It is both surprising and regrettable that in a discussion on a question of aesthetics there are still critics (?) to be found who make "moral significance" (in the words of one of your correspondents) the test of great art. Without in any way wishing to defend the "Art for Art's Sake" or Wildeian aestheticism, I do not believe that good artistic criticism should be concerned with the "morality," or the opposite, of any work of art, for the simple reason that this aspect of art is a secondary one, and more accidental than intentional. The musician, for example, does not try to compose "good" music in the moral sense of the word, but tries to compose music which shall be musically "good." Morality has to do with conduct; art is expression. The only criterion for criticism (or at least the chief one), as far as I can see, is the extent to which the artist has succeeded in doing what he set out to do. The critic must judge him on this plane, and on no other. It is not his business to say that A is a greater artist than B merely because he (the critic) was more "morally uplifted" by A's productions than by B's; to prove his assertion about A he must produce other evidence, possibly of a technical or some other kind, which will clearly show why B as artist, must be considered inferior to A. The artistic faculty is a sense, like smelling or tasting; and to praise a symphony for its morality is like praising pea-soup because it is green. The greenness and the morality are in both cases attributes, not essential, but accidental. Nevertheless, great art is, of course, significant; but its significance is not necessarily "moral." Humanity in the widest sense, rather than morality, is, I suggest, the most striking characteristic of great art, because great art, like life, is universal; and the greatest artists have been, not preachers, but recorders, transforming what they record by their own profound sympathy with humanity in all its aspects.

Yours, etc.,

Rollo H. Myers.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—Mr. E. J. Dent's view, expressed in your issue of May 14, that the five most abstruse of Beethoven's sonatas were the greatest of all music, might be difficult to substantiate. I feel, however, that H. C.'s more recent statement, in his protest against the above-stated opinion, that these works are both un pianistic and unintelligible, should not be allowed to pass without comment. If these are the views of Beethoven's enthusiastic admirers it were well for H. C. if he turned a deaf ear to such and listened only to the sonatas themselves.

The works of innovators are, usually, at first regarded as unintelligible, but that this view should be held widely, at this time of day, of Beethoven's works, is quite incomprehensible. I should like to thank Mr. Dent for drawing attention to these wonderfully beautiful works, which have been for such a long time so strangely neglected.

Yours faithfully,

Ernest Cutting

A MODEL STORY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Surely K. M. has missed the point and the point of "The Third Window." Miss Latimer was not the dead man's anonymous Catus, but the ingenious K. M. had read carelessly, thoughtlessly, or thinking of some other story not by A. D. Sedgwick? Had Miss Latimer been Malcolm's sister, would Anne Douglas Sedgwick have written "The Third Window"? I venture to doubt it. George III, asked how the apple got into the dumpling. One sometimes wonders how the novel has got into the review... I imagine the brilliant reviewer after a prolonged gape into the hand-glass hitting the looker-on in the eye.

Another query: Is Antonius convinced that the immorality of Trotsky is more secure than Lenin's?

Yours faithfully,

A. S. R.

THE LATE SIR EDWARD COOK

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I am engaged in writing the biography of the late Sir Edward Cook (published by Messrs. Constable), and should be greatly obliged if those who have preserved any letters of interest received from him would kindly forward them to me at Londwater, Upton Road, Watford. They will be carefully treated, and returned in due course.

Yours faithfully,

J. Saxon Mills

From the Periodical, the house organ of the Oxford University Press, we learn that the Oxford Dictionary, with Dr. Craigie's new section "Visor-Vyver," now fills 14,169 pages, in which 378,185 words are dealt with and the huge total of 1,650,917 illustrative quotations are given.
FOREIGN LITERATURE

PEDANTRY AND SYSTEM

CROCE'S "Estetica," published as the first volume of the "Filosofia dello Spirito" in 1900, holds the field; not that it is not criticized—which would be a sign of death—but that nothing else is. The theory then sketched out was expanded and expounded, under the title of "Problemi di Estetica," in the first volume of these "Saggi," and again in the "Breviario di Estetica" (1913), a reprint of which occupies about one-third of the present volume. The introduction, while referring to the original "Estetica" for the criticism by which earlier aesthetics are superseded, now offers a fuller determination of the idea of art and of art's history.

Croce's general definition of art—"an impulse embodied in an image," as he once more phrases it—is well known. It should be instructive to see whether it gains or loses by the new presentation, to which the author attaches considerable value as calculated to remove the reproach of negativity and harshness admitted to hold against his earlier treatment. To that end we are here given, on the one hand, mere constructive and positive deduction of his conception of art from his general philosophy of the mind, and, on the other, an attempt to justify that concept by exhibiting its application to definite problems of artistic criticism, or rather by deducing their correct solution from it. The earlier method was less abstract, more Socratic; it showed, by appealing to artistic experience, that the theory propounded covered the facts of that experience better than any rival. If we still prefer this to the more a priori deduction now offered us, that may indicate very significant divergencies from Croce's general philosophical method.

The tendency criticized is well illustrated in the last chapter of this book. From the premiss that the moment a problem is clearly stated (that is, as soon as there really is a problem) it is solved, we reach the conclusion that there are no unsolved problems, with the corollary that "since this proof is logically impregnable, problems cited as actually existing in order to confute it cannot really exist." That such a deduction of facts from system may be false and cannot be fruitful is admirably shown by Croce's own instance: Since the problem whether Gemma Donati was a good wife to Dante is, with our present data, insoluble, it cannot be a real problem, though it might become one with the discovery of new documents! It is just this pedantic frivolity which has given a bad name, or a bad influence, to Croce's philosophy among many students who have not proceeded to its more serious content. His predilection for such methods cannot be explained as merely the prejudice which all men have for the validity of their own hypothesis. It is an exaggeration of the philosophic and pre-eminently idealistic vice (itself only a defect of the philosophic virtue) of preferring rationalization to reflection upon the facts.

No doubt, if a system and the account of some particular fact be true they must be consistent, and either may be appealed to in support of the other. But deduction from the system is evidence only convincing to disciples; and, moreover, since a system's only claim to truth is that it explains the facts, the privilege of arguing that nothing can be a fact which it does not explain is one that should be rarely exercised. Thus the argument that art is not a physical fact is offshore weakened by being based on the dogma (not here fully expounded) that physical facts are "unreal," while art is "real." But, whether we believe this or not, we must all believe, as Croce himself often admits, that there is a sense in which our bodies and other physical facts are real; and the relevant point is to distinguish art from such facts. As he says on p. 56, it is sometimes better "not to insist on this rather abstract scheme, but, instead, to see how it is realized in the life of the mind."

Symptomatic of the same tendency is the doctrine, familiar to readers of the "Problemi," that all criticism is dependent on aesthetic. This is here supported by an argument itself of that abstract nature which carries no conviction because it may be true or false according to the exact meaning and application of its terms in any given context: "Criticism is judgment; judgment implies a criterion; a criterion of judgment implies the thinking of a concept; the thinking of a concept implies relation with other concepts, and this, in the end, is system or philosophy." On hardly any point has Croce spent more pains in elucidation, and hardly any remains more obscure. Criticism is not artistic appreciation, which must precede it; nor is it that approach to artistic appreciation which can be opened by historical or philological scholarship; nor yet is it that stimulus to appreciation given by an expression, itself a work of art, of the critic's own aesthetic experience. It is not praise and condemnation. It is identified with the history of art in individual monographs. More precisely it is the union of the concept of art with its history—the attribution of that concept to historical events; and the adequacy of the concept so predicated depends upon the philosophy of the time and its assimilation by the critic. Yet the existence of admirable critics cannot make it possible for us outside the realm of aesthetic experience, to know that aesthetic experience, in the form Croce has propounded it, is or has been fruitful. It is explained by saying that "the concept was present, though often fused in judgments"; from which it would seem that a critic may, after all, perform his whole duty, of correctly distinguishing artistic and inartistic works, without any aesthetic theory at all. This is what we should have expected both from the history of criticism and a priori. While aesthetic theory is a generalization from aesthetic experiences, and must be tested by the new experiences which occur, not they by it. The same holds good in ethics, where neither the good man nor the prophet of morality nor the historian need possess a moral philosophy; it is enough if he know good acts when he sees them, for they can never be described from the idea of goodness. It is the same again with truth, of which no logical definition or criterion is necessary in order to expose error or appreciate evidence.

The only useful effect, as distinct from its intrinsic interest, of aesthetic upon criticism which Croce succeeds in establishing is negative. Pure aesthetic-historical judgment upon works of art is apt to be tainted by false theories—rationalist, moralist, hedonist, scientific—and a truer theory is the only antidote; just as only by the Kantian revolution was the pure moral judgment rescued from the tyranny of utilitarian, aesthetic, rationalist usurpers.

But the obscurity of Croce's doctrine of criticism is not likely to be cleared up while the necessary possibility of communicating an artistic expression by means of physical signs remains for his philosophy ultimately mysterious. It is in this fundamental point that we believe his idealism to be really vulnerable; to Professor Bosanquet's criticism that an expression must be embodied in some material form we believe the answer, repeated on pp. 36-37, had been already given.

The "Estetica" of twenty years ago has not, then, been surpassed either by others or by Croce himself. Its original merits and weaknesses are reproduced in less or more salient forms. There is the same brilliant criticism of all unesthetic criteria, and especially of the classifications of Classical and Romantic, Form and Content; the same clear distinction between Fancy and Imagination (our terms being reversed in the Italian), and a somewhat more sympathetic discussion of the meaning of "Universality" in art. There is also the same perversity (perhaps again justifiable by some flavour of the Italian word not discoverable by a foreigner) in identifying "beauty" with "pleasantness," and thus distinguishing it from the virtue of art. Yet even this perversity gives occasion to the striking suggestion that forms once the vehicle for artistic activity—the "classics" of our own or the world's youth—may, even when they are emptied of life, in this sense still be called beautiful.

In a word, the great and original contribution remains, not unattended either by its old incidental weaknesses or by new and arresting flashes of insight, but in its main outlines neither enriched nor enlarged.

La Vie Commence Demain. Par Guido da Verona. (Paris, Calmann-Lévy 4fr. 90.)—Guido da Verona is pursuing his path of conquest even in translations, for this is the fifth edition of M. F. Le Hénaff's version of "La Vita Comincia Domani"; but he has still a long way to go before he overtakes the successes he has scored in his native land. This is undoubtedly Verona's best novel. His characters are nothing if not vigorously drawn, and here he has been more than usually successful. The comfortable Landi household on their country estate, with the old parents and the servants; the lively, pretty Maria Dora, and Marcuccio, the only son, whose brain has given way from overwork, with his violin and his strange poems, the refrain from one of which is continually running in Ferento's ears, and therefore gives the title to the novel—all this makes an effective background to the tragedy. The great scientist Ferento dominates the book absolutely. It never occurred to him to yield to the temptation of making away with his friend, now stricken with a mortal illness, though he is passionately in love with his wife Novella, who is already his mistress. Not till Giorgio asks him to kill him himself does he consent to poison him. Ferento carries everything before him; but after his acquittal he finds it impossible to go on with his hospital work. Though fully justified in his own eyes, he nevertheless knows that he has proved false to his trust as a doctor and violated a great natural law. He is not the superman he imagined. His love for Novella is the one thing that matters for him. It is this side of Verona that lifts his work above the commonplaces and gives this novel something of the dignity of a tragedy, though we imagine that his great popularity is due rather to his skill in handling powerful situations and constructing an absorbing story.

A CATALAN POET-PAINTER.

A recent number of Vell i Nou alluded to the pictures of the delightful sixteenth-century Catalan poet Pere Serafí. A large Last Judgment ascribed to him existed formerly in the monastery of Montserrat, but of works now known those assigned to him with some certainty are the pictures in Tarragona Cathedral. Very little is known about Serafí. He is said to have been a Greek and signed as "The Greek." It is most extraordinary to find two painters of the same time in Spain calling themselves "El Greco." Did Pere Serafí come to Spain from Crete and Rome like, and perhaps in the company of, Domenico Theotocopoulos? He was certainly no disciple, and appears to have been a few years older than the two. The grace and charm of his Nativity in Tarragona Cathedral is in the manner rather of Alonso Cano than of the great Domenico, and forms an interesting comparison and contrast with the latter's Nativity at Valencia. We shall surely hear more of Pere Serafí, painter. Now that attention has been attracted to his work, fresh documents will almost certainly come to light. His poems, published in the second half of the sixteenth century, and twice in the nineteenth, are charmingly light and fresh. Witness the Cancó which Angelo Poliziano a century earlier would not have disdained to write. It begins:

Si 'm lev de bon mati
Y ani-m-en toda soleta
Y entro-en-dins mon jardi
Dratinent,
L'ayre dolent la fin riret,
Per cullir la violets.

LITERATURE AND PRESENT-DAY RUSSIA

II.

Nor let us forget that though Balzac’s “Poor Relations,” Gogol’s “Dead Souls,” and “The Pickwick Papers” are to be considered books that describe conditions of actual life, there is hidden in them a great and imperishable lesson which the best university cannot provide, and which an average man will not have learnt so exactly or so clearly after fifty years of hard-working life.

The habitual is not always banal, for it is habitual for man to be consumed in books that describe conditions of actual life, and this self-consumption is always beautiful and necessary, as it is instructive for those who timidly shoulder all their life long, without blazing up in the bright flame that destroys the man and illuminates the mysteries of his spirit.

Human errors are not so characteristic of the art of the word and image; more characteristic is its longing to raise man above the external conditions of existence, to free him from the fetters of the degrading actuality, to show him to himself not as the slave, but as the lord of circumstance, the free creator of life, and in this sense literature is ever revolutionary.

By the mighty effort of genius rising above all circumstances of actuality, saturated with the spirit of humanity, kindling its hatred from the excess of passionate love, fine literature, prose and poetry, is our great vindication, and not our condemnation. It knows that there are no guilty—although everything is in man, everything is from man. The cruel contradictions of life that arouse the eminence and hatred of nations, classes, individuals, are to literature only an inveterate error, and she believes that the ennobled will of men can and must destroy all errors, all that which, arresting the free development of the spirit, delivers man into the power of animal instincts.

If you look closely into the mighty stream of creative energy embodied in the word and image, you feel and believe that the great purpose of this stream is to wash away for ever all the differences between races, nations, classes, and, by freeing men from the hard burden of the struggle with each other, to direct all their forces to the struggle with the mysterious forces of nature. And it seems that their art of the word and image is and will be the religion of all mankind—a religion that absorbs everything that is written in the sacred writings of ancient India, in the Zend-Avesta, in the Gospels and Koran.

This, in a rough and superficial outline, is the attitude to literature which—without prejudice to individual deviations to one or another side—is professed by the group of workers of “World Literature,” organized under the People’s Commissary for Instruction with the object of publishing the works of the most considerable writers of England, America, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Scandinavia, Hungary, etc.

As may be seen from the accompanying list, the publishing company “World Literature” has now—as the beginning of its activity—made a selection from the works published in various countries since the end of the eighteenth century until our days, from the beginning of the Great French Revolution to the Great Russian Revolution. Thus the Russian citizen will have at his disposal all the treasures of poetry and artistic prose created during a century and a half of the intense spiritual creation of Europe.

Together the books will form an extensive historico-literary anthology, which contains the possibility to model acquainting himself with the rise, creative work and fall of literary schools, with the development of the technique of poetry and prose, with the mutual influences of the literatures of different nations, and, generally, with the whole movement of literary evolution in its historic continuity—from Voltaire to Gogol, from Flaubert to Richardson to Wells, from Goethe to Hauptmann, and so on.

This series of books is designed for popular education, and is intended for readers desirous of studying the history of literary creation in the interval between the two revolutions.

The books will be accompanied by introductions, biographies of the authors, outlines of the epoch which has given rise to each school, group or work, a historico-literary commentary and bibliographical notes. It is intended to publish more than 1,500 such books, each of about 320 numbered pages.

Later on “World Literature” intends to acquaint the Russian people with the literatures of the Middle Ages, with the literature of Russia and other Slavonic countries, as well as with the imagined thought and word creation of the East, with the true literature of India, Persia, China, Japan, and the Arabs.

Simultaneously with this series will be published a series of brochures intended for the widest circulation among the masses. The brochures will contain the most outstanding things in the literature of Europe and America, and will be accompanied by biographies, notes, sociological sketches, etc.

As it enters with determination upon the road of spiritual union with the peoples of Europe and Asia, the Russian people in all its mass must know the peculiarities of the history, social life, and psychology of these nations and races, together with whom it now aspires to build up new forms of social existence.

Literature, the living and imaged history of the exploits and errors, of the excellences and failures of our ancestors, possessing the mighty power of influencing the organization of thought, of refining the cruelty of the instincts, educating the will, must finally fulfill her planetary rôle—the rôle of the people which most firmly and most intimately unites the peoples by the consciousness of their sufferings and longings, by the consciousness of the community of their desire for the happiness of a life that is beautiful and free.

The object of the brochures is to acquaint the reader from the masses as fully as possible with the ways of life of the peoples of Europe and America, to show the community and variety of their ideas, aspirations, customs—to prepare the Russian reader to gain the knowledge of the world and of men which is so generously and vitally presented by artistic literature, and through which the mutual understanding of different-speaking peoples is most easily achieved.

The domain of “World Literature” is the International of the spirit, and in our day, when the idea of the brotherhood of the peoples, of the social International, is visibly being transformed into reality, into necessity, we are bound to strain every effort in order that the assimilation of the satyric idea of universal brotherhood should be carried on with the utmost speed, and penetrate into the depths of the mind and will of the masses.

The wider his knowledge, the more perfect is man; the keener and more eager man’s interest in his fellow-men, the quicker will be accomplished the process of fusion of the good creative elements into one united power, the quicker we shall pass through our sufferings and stations of the cross to the universal festival of mutual understanding, respect, brotherhood—to our own glory.

In order to make reading attractive to uneducated people, the series of brochures will include books of an external interest, stories with complicated plots, amusing, humorous stories, historical novels, tales of adventure, etc.

The brochures will be published in a chronological order, so that even the readers from the masses should be enabled to trace clearly the process of the spiritual development of Europe—from the Great Revolution until our tragic days. It is proposed to publish between three and five thousand brochures, each containing 32-64 numbered pages.

In its extent this great publishing scheme is unique in Europe.

The honour of realizing this undertaking belongs to the creative forces of the Russian Revolution—of the revolution which has destroyed the “horsemen, brothers” in beginning such a responsible and vast work of culture in the very first year of its activity, in circumstances difficult beyond description, the Russian people has the right to say that it is erecting a monument to itself worthy of itself.

After the criminal and accursed slaughter ignorominously committed by the servile men intoxicated with their passionate worship of the fat Yellow Devil of gold, after the bloody tempest of malice and hatred, nothing could be more opportune than to present the wide picture of spiritual creation. At the festival of the brute and the beast let men remember all that is truly human that the ages have taught us, that genius and talent have taught the world,

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the sub-class. Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

Crotchet (W. Waller). Industrial Anarchy—and the Way Out. Hutchinson, 1920. 8 in. 140 pp., 2/6 n. 331

To affirm that the author states his case capably and puts forward telling arguments in its favour, does not imply agreement with all that he advances. Premising that the English worker has lost his zeal and gaiety, and is generally dissatisfied, Mr. Crotchet discusses the causes of this discontent, and endeavours to find remedies. That the working man is now separated by a wide gulf from his employer, that he has become part of a machine, that his toil yields products with neither character nor individuality, and that there is a huge disparity between the employee's and employer's rewards, are in Mr. Crotchet's judgment, among the main causes of the discontent. Some of the remedies suggested are an early solution of the housing problem; payment on a piece-work basis; greater facilities for social intercourse and amusements; and less outside interference with the long-established habits of the workers.

The central theme of sociology, as conceived by Professor Findlay and lucidly expounded in this excellent introduction to a comparatively new, extremely comprehensive, but somewhat elusively scientific, is the definition of social groups, their classification and their relations to each other. The treatment is systematic, though some problems of considerable importance, such as the institution of land tenure, have had to be omitted. The first five chapters are devoted to principles. The second part relates to types of social grouping, such as family, state, religion, and occupation. In the third part, which is concerned with organization, the positions of the leader, the official, and the representative, are discussed; and there is an analysis of the instinct of loyalty. One of the author's conclusions is that "we can only maintain the State by maintaining also in due proportion our allegiance to other social groups." Professor Findlay abounds in original and relevant material which will render the book useful to students and others who require a lucid, concise, and substantial exposition of the subject.

Herbert (Sydney). Nationality and its Problems. Methuen, [1920]. 8 in. 185 pp. index, 5/6 n. 320

In this careful study the author stresses the distinction between race and nationality, and defines the latter as "a form of consciousness of kin, related to a definite home-country, which binds men together irrespective of political allegiance and opinions, religious beliefs, and economic interests." A nation, declares Mr. Herbert, is "a social group, bound together by a consciousness of kind which springs from the tradition evoked by the group's historic past, and is directly related to a definite home-country." The conclusion expresses in its final chapter is Professor A. E. Zimmern's, namely, that nationality is "not a political question at all. It is primarily and essentially a spiritual question, and, in particular, an educational question." To a social group it is what personality is to an individual.

*Ashton (William). The Evolution of a Coast-Line: Barrow to Aberystwyth and the Isle of Man, with notes on lost towns, submarine discoveries, etc. maps, ill. Stanford, 1920. 8 in. 314 pp., index, 10/6 n. 551

In a previous book, "The Battle of Land and Sea," the author described the changes that have occurred in a smaller section of the West Coast. This is a full, physiographically account of widespread erosion and considerable accretions which are going on now and have resulted in vast alterations of riversourses as well as the coast, even in historical times. Ptolemy's Bellsama is identified with the Ribble or the Mersey; the problems of the site of Portus Setantii, and how Harlech was reached by the sea; the legend of the drowned palace and demesne supposed to be represented by the bank of Llys Helig, and the story of Seithyn's delinquency and the loss of Cantref Gwaedol, are among the absorbing questions treated with much illuminating detail by Mr. Ashton.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

A substantial and copiously-illustrated volume, the author of which is professionally associated with the Lancashire and Western Sea Fisheries Joint Committee. Mr. Jenkins describes from personal knowledge the mystery of the fishers' craft. An account is given of the methods of fishing adopted in the North Sea; and the narrative deals with the rise of the herring fisheries, as well as with the development of steam trawling. Public fisheries, their methods described; and an important chapter deals with individual fish, such as the sole, plaice, haddock, and herring. Foreign and colonial fisheries are considered in the last chapter. The volume is full of information.

700 FINE ARTS.

Ives (Herbert E.). Airplane Photography. Lippincott [1920]. 8 in. 422 pp. il. index, 18/ n. 770

Every reader of books dealing with the great war—and who has been able to avoid them—is aware of the rapid development of airplane photography during the years of conflict, and of the outstanding importance, from a military point of view, of this art especially in topographical and other purposes its usefulness will extend; and the author, who treats his subject, so far as possible, as a branch of scientific photography, has produced a book likely to be of service, not only to readers interested in the military aspects of airplane photography, but also to those whose thoughts are directed towards possibilities of applicatations in this fascinating department of photographic work. A suggestive chapter deals with future developments in apparatus and methods.

800 LITERATURE.

Most of the characters of this Masterlinckian play are children—the family of a widowed queen driven out by a usurper—and, presumably, it is meant to be played by children.
Gammer Gurton's Neddle; by Mr. S. Mr. of Art; ed by H.P.B.
Brett-Smith ("The Percy Reprints"). Oxford, Blackwell, 1920. 8 in. 96 pp. app. 4.6 n. 824.9

Rejecting the accepted claim of John Still, sometime Bishop of Bath and Wells, the editor thinks the author of the ancient comedy was William Stevenson, fellow of Christ's, who was known to have written a play. This is an exact reproduction of the original text, together with a short introduction, notes, and emendations of the play recently presented by Dr. Boas at University College, London.

The thoughts that rise unbidden in the stress of life, and even in the hurly-burly of war, are the substance of these essays or notes for essays. The author jotted them down in the meandering of a "despised field ambulance" in the wake of Deventer's Horse. Two facts forced themselves on his mind: we do not comprehend the power of intuition in moulding our thoughts and in building up our lives; and subconsciousness is the worthiest part in us. The book provides serious thoughts for thoughtful readers.

POETRY.

Granath (A. E.). The Wisdom of Akhaton. Lane, 1920. 7 in. 179 pp., 6/ n. 821.9

The figure of a ruler who believed in the infinite power of love in practical existence, as opposed to that of strife and racial antagonism, has a peculiar attraction for the modern imagination, which is beginning to recover from a surfeit of all that is antiethical to love. Mr. Granath has employed such a figure, that of the Pharaoh Akhaton, as the foundation of a dramatic poem, and his portrayal of the ruler who acts in defiance of his dynasty, and fights a war, is managed with a good deal of skill and entire sympathy. The Pharaoh’s idea of uniting all the tribes of the world in the worship of the one bountiful God leads to the end of the revolution, but his prophetic eloquence in face of the mob is such that the spirit of aggression is defeated. The verse is adequate throughout, and the climax might easily be made by stage presentation into an impressive spectacle.

Holmes (Edmond). Sonnets and Poems: an anthology selected and arranged by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson. R. Cobden-Sanderson, 1920. 9 in. 126 pp., 6/ n. 821.9

See notice, p. 761.

Mackenzie (Dan). Pride o’ Raploch; and other poems. Elkin Mathews, 1920. 7½ in. 63 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

“Pride o’ Raploch” is a long narrative poem of a love that ended in tragedy. So far as a mere Southerner can understand it—for it is written in the most obscurely Scottish of tongues—it seems to be a well-told and well-written poem.

Rutter (Owen). The Song of Tiadatha. Fisher Unwin, 1920. 7½ in. 144 pp., 4.6 n. 821.9

“Tiadatha” is a breezy way of saying “Tired Arthur,” and his song is modelled very cleverly on Longfellow. The story is supposed to be that of many others who were wealthy idlers in war-time, and who obtained commissions and experienced the fever and servitude of army life in France and Salonica. The publisher claims in a note to the first English edition (the original publication was in the columns of the Orient Weekly, Salonica) that “Tiadatha” is a little copy of the great war. It is indeed an epic, if one can call such a dignified title for a composition which is all gentle satire and kindly poking of fun at an essentially English type, and yet without any literary merit whatsoever. This latter fact, however, has not prevented, nor will it prevent, a large number of the Salonic army from treasuring Capt. Rutter’s verses.

This conciseness is plainly the outcome of sheer high spirits. Mr. Sieveking has found in Mr. Alec Macdonald an artist who is able to play up to him as vitally as did Mr. John Nash in the volume, “Dressing-Gowns and Glove,” published last year. There does not seem, all the same, to be any particular reason why more of these mock-humorous verses, which most of us write at one time or another, should not be illustrated and issued after the same manner. An example of Mr. Sieveking’s work is “Lyric Bouwowsesque,” with its opening lines—“Heave of his standard—
I wandered round and round and round
Along the cliffs, along the sand,
I trod the faded crinkled ground
(The moonbeams urged not a sound)— and much stressing of the fact that the sea simply waved its tail at the poet. The second half of the volume is a satirical production of a novel on modern lines, but the humorous vein wears thinner and thinner.

FICTION.

See review, p. 780.

The title-role is filled by a charming heroine who has been washed up by the sea sixteen years before the story opens. Adopted by the eccentric Henry Eton, who taught her nothing but knowledge, the Pretty Dear is practically a little too artless, indeed, to seem real—in this world, at all events. She is fortunate in her circle of acquaintances, succeeds to an enormous fortune, and generally “falls on her feet.” The author’s experience as a writer of eminently readable fiction enables her thoroughly to enlist the reader’s interest in this wild flower heroine, whose lot in life is evidently destined to be very comfortable.

When Gypsy and Ginger got married, Gypsy (the gentlema) proposes that they build a little house, with only one room, but two doors—one door his, and the other hers. When the weather is fine you will come out of your door while I stay inside and cook the sausages, and when it is bad I will come out of my door while you go in and make the tea. And all the people will give us pennies for telling them what the weather is.” Gypsy had always loved and often admired Gypsy: but on hearing the above brilliant plan for embarking on married life she almost respected him. Miss Farjeon’s stories are in this level of quaint whimsicality which grown-ups and young people alike find enjoyment in; when Ginger expresses the fear that Gypsy’s suggestion will not permit husband and wife to meet very often, he asks her to “think how jolly it would be to wave to each other.” The book tells how the plan worked out in relation not merely to housekeeping, but to friends and strangers. It is wholly delightful, and will enhance Miss Farjeon’s reputation in a form of story-telling that she can do with as much charm in prose as hitherto in verse.

Mrs. Felkin has once more resorted to that device of mistaken identity which she employed in "A Double Thumb." The conditions are here considerably altered, but not, we think, in the direction of greater probability. The author’s store of generalizations, concerning the human male and female, has been extended to cover the mentality of spinsters, to whom it seems, “every man is more or less a hero or a villain.” Her devout matrons are now pillars of the Establishment, not, as in her earlier books, of Wesleyanism. Her criticism of life remains, as always, good-natured and mildly amusing.

In this story dealing with rationalism, Roman Catholicism, moral standards of husbands and wives, and kindred topics, the most agreeable and natural personage is the struggling young man, John Haight, whose life is as shallow and unstable Anne O’Sullivan (aged 15), immediately after her father’s death. Anne’s future sister-in-law, Francesca, is a likeable character: but the heroine herself is difficult to understand, almost to the end of the book. Her husband does not attract the reader, whose chief regret is that the author sees fit to kill off "poor old John."

A pleasant and successful "first novel," in which the author depicts a Mesopotamian town where the hero, Captain Galt, Political Officer, affects a number of sanitary and other improvements, and becomes popular with the inhabitants. Difficulties arise, owing to Galt's championship of a girl who is pestering by the unwelcome attentions of a powerful Arab sheikh. The unconventional shepherdess-heroine is the leading figure in a pretty love idyll; and skilful Oriental colouring imbues the whole of the book. Mr. McDougall has given us a savoury baggis, and his work is distinctly promising.

Reminiscences of Hardy, Kipling and Baring-Gould are easily discernible in this innocuously agreeable tale. The scene is laid in a moorland parish, and the characters include an ideal rector and rector's daughter, a high-souled gipsy girl, his opposite number, and a half-crazy collector of authentic idols "besmeared with blood of human sacrifice, and parents' tears." There are three or four love affairs, of which only one ends happily, and the interest is varied by some sufficiently stirring adventures.

Stanton (Coralie) and Hosken (Heath). The Buried Torch.

Parsons, 1920. 8 in. 306 pp. 7/ n.

Sometimes in our fiction-reading we have to prepare ourselves for a double-barrelled dose of adeptness. The authors of "The Buried Torch" do not fail us. As we follow their second novel, the hero and its heroine, with its heroines and its villain, Leopold Lazarus, we have the feeling that Miss Stanton and Mr. Hosken are as breathless as we are; that their chapters are done in turn at a reckless speed, one writer exhausted and down, and the other coming up, fresh and more determined than ever. Sometimes one of them attempts a development but he (or she) is kept stilly in check by the other. "She looked down on the calm face [of a friend who an instant earlier has died suddenly] for a moment. 'Boy,' she said, with a woman's innate comprehension, 'he looks like a man whose life has been passed in the shadows.'" Then come the inevitable asterisks, like a hand lapped over the words, and the curt statement made, if one may fairly guess, by the stern one) that "The next morning Gallert's servants telephoned to Nance that he was dead."

Tyler (Philippa). The Manaton Disaster. Heath Cranton, 1920. 7 in. 290 pp., 6.9 r.

In the final chapter Linden, the heroine, finds "the long-awaited kiss even more wonderful than she had anticipated." That is perhaps because she had a good deal to go through in the way of adventure, misunderstanding, and hardship before she reached it. Indeed, the author does not attach to the kiss a tithle of the importance that she attaches to even the most trivial incidents that can thicken and help on her most enthralling plot.

See notice, p. 780.

Miss Wynne is well-known as a writer of historical, or pseudo-historical romances, and in the present instance, we think, she surpasses her usual level. She has placed the action in this century, thus obviating all necessity for a Wardour Street atmosphere; and a conspiracy which has for its object the coronation of a French king, lineally descended from Louis XVI., provides an original and attractive motif. There is also a rather taking heroine, who, having come unexpectedly into a large fortune, and yearning after notoriety and excitements, entangles herself with the conspirators, and is thus exposed to dangers, matrimonial and otherwise. All, however, ends happily.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Lovett (William). Life and Struggles of William Lovett, in His Pursuit of Bread, Knowledge, and Freedom. With some short account of the different associations he belonged to, and of the opinions he entertained ("Bohn's Popular Library: Social-Economic Section."). Bell, 1920. 2 vols. 7 in. 278, 236 pp., 2/4 n. each. 920

Mr. R. H. Tawney contributes a useful introduction to this serviceable reprint of the autobiography of Lovett, whose valuable edifice-work in the cause of reform, as Founder and Secretary of the London Working Men's Association, Secretary of the Chartist Convention of 1839, and holder of important offices in similar bodies, is at the present time worthy as close study as are the records of more recent efforts on behalf of the masses.

This serviceable reprint from the original edition of Owen's autobiography, which was published in 1857-8, will be heartily welcomed by sociologists, students of economics, and general readers interested in the history of social experiments. The original edition has been out of print for many years.

IS THERE A NEW GENERATION?

FEW phrases spring more readily to the lips, or flow more easily from the pen, than that of "a new generation." There are variants of it; we speak and write of "modern" literature, "modern" painting, the "modern" man. We do not mean by this what is merely contemporary: we hear it said that there is something extremely modern in Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida," and that among our contemporaries such a one is modern, while another is not.

Presumably, we mean something: but what do we mean? Is there a way of feeling and thinking more or less common to men and women now under middle age to-day, an attitude to life which is different from that of our predecessors, and by which this present age will be distinguished, a hundred years hence, from that which went before and that which will follow after?

Probably there is. We feel around us: a very conscious refusal to accept the ideals of a past generation, a hesitation to endow any ideal at all with the old sanctities, a determination not to be gulled, above all not to gull ourselves: a curious, almost perverse satisfaction in the shattering of the dream by the fact; an utter mistrust of the old full-sounding words. Liberty—we look at America; Democracy—we look at ourselves; Republicanism—we look at France; Equality—we look at Russia; Justice—we look at Europe.

This general refusal to believe is modern. We can see a relation between this and what passes for modern in literature, in painting even. But what relation is there between it and the modernity that is claimed for Chaucer or for Shakespeare? True, it would be hard to say that either of those great men believed in anything in the sense that an Englishman of ten years ago was supposed to believe in democracy; but it would be much harder to say that they refused to believe. And in one thing we may say with confidence that they believed with all their hearts. They believed in life. They never wearied of delighting in it, never faltered in their self-appointed task of adding something to its infinite and varied texture. That delight is seldom found to-day. The modern motive is not to add to life, but to refine upon it.

In other words, when it claims these great men as modern the present age comes nearest to a profession of faith; yet it professes, not faith, but a desire for it. And the faith it desires is a faith in life. How can this be recovered? Surely it is not impossible. For faith in life, as those great men if not our own consciousness tell us, has nothing to do with faith in the ends which the prophets, the philosophers, the scientists, and the statesmen assign to it. We may smile at the millennium, mistrust democracy, be contemptuous of aristocracy, find civilization a lie, and still have faith in life. We need not believe that it is leading anywhere, much less to a painless paradise, but we may believe that it is an infinitely exciting, infinitely lovely interplay of wills and desires, achievements and frustrations, dreams and realities.

The "modern" is too fond of thinking that he has shown up life. What he shows us is not life at all. He is typified by the novelist who pathetically believes that psycho-analysis has added a cubit to his stature, whereas he stuggles like a pygmy under the burden.

Convey, if you can, the quality of the passion of a man for woman in a single line: you will have done more than an encyclopaedia of analysis of their complexes. You will have declared your faith in life; you will have done more—added something to it, made it more wonderful than it was.
THE BANDSTAND

M R. TOD had been assured that if only he took care to cross the common by way of the bandstand he would have no difficulty in finding the house. At the moment, however, he was contemplating that walk with some dismay. The weather was truly wretched. After a day of unbroken gloom the evening was closing in damp and chill and foggy. Sheer necessity alone would have dragged him from the fireside comforts of home on such a night; for, though Mr. Tod was regarded as a shrewd business man who had "not done badly" during the war, he prided himself on being "strictly honourable" in private affairs, and would no more have dreamt of breaking his word to a friend than of selling at less than the highest possible rate. Hence the journey!

After a hard day's work in the city, forty minutes' jolting over war-time neglected roads in a motor omnibus ("five only allowed to stand inside") is a fairly trying experience for a man of middle age. Moreover, he had been irritated by a nasally-troubled fellow-passenger who, with the air of one bestowing consolation, informed him that the weather was "seasonable" and therefore "buzzing." Mr. Tod began to wonder if he had travelled by irance, which really would have suited him better; but he had peculiar and rigid principles which forbade his using a municipalized conveyance if another were available.

And now he had to alight; by dint of violent exertions and dexterous writhings, he reached the steps of the omnibus, and noted that the fog had changed to a fine drizzle.

"Raining!" he remarked to the conductor. "Just a few 'eat spots!'" was the ironic reply. "'urry up, please!"

And the bell rang—twice!

At the edge of the common, a policeman stood motionless under a lamp; he hunched his shoulders glistening with rain dust.

He pointed out the path to the bandstand, giving bewilderingly precise directions in a deep West-Country voice.

"You can't miss it, sir!" he concluded, "an easy ten minutes' walk!"

Mr. Tod proceeded as directed. In summer it might have been a pleasant walk, but to-night!—and Mr. Tod again cursed the luck which forced him abroad. The path was unlighted and bordered with tall trees; under his feet the loose gravel girted uncomfortably; as he strained his eyes in the darkness, the drizzle collected on his glasses, blurring his vision. He felt lonely; far ahead from some high building a single light gleamed, mistily.

It was then that the queer thing happened. Quite suddenly, Mr. Tod sensed the near presence of an unseen, unheard crowd. He paused for an instant mystified and startled; then pushed on again. At that moment the dome of the bandstand, like a sudden and gigantic mushroom, pushed itself up through the trees. Mr. Tod had not been mistaken; now he heard voices and laughter, the shuffling tramp of many feet. He came clear of the trees, and, there in the space surrounding the bandstand, he saw dimly a great multitude of moving shadows. Mr. Tod hastily wiped his glasses; then he saw and understood; the mystic revellers were youths and maidens, free awhile from office and workshop, full of unsatisfied desires, gathered here in quest of adventure. Round and round the bandstand they went, pale-faced and bedraggled, jostling one another in amorous horseplay. Stirrlish merriment gave ready response to crude male buffoonery, here and there were chasings and scufflings; someone was humming the "Maxina"; in the distance, a girl coughed, hysterically. A gang of youths approached; they forced a path through the crowd and sang a dubious version of "Three Blind Mice" in the nasal drawl of the Cockney; it was a dismal performance, and soon the chant tailed off—miserably.

Mr. Tod regarded the spectacle with righteous anger; he didn't believe that these young folks were really enjoying themselves; there was something forced in the fun, a pretence of high spirits, an atmosphere of determined hilarity, the mechanical gaiety of a wedding. Two flappers strolled by. "O Pa!" cried one, "I'm surprised at yer!" and passed on with writhing in the throes of incredible laughter. Her exuberance attracted a slim youth in a yellow macintosh; by a neat manoeuvre, he succeeded in colliding with her... Mock anger and mock apologies... more laughter and the walk was resumed with yellow macintosh arm in arm with the flappers.

Mr. Tod was filled with loathing; something a friend once said to him came to his mind, something to the effect that when people lose the sense of propriety they lose the sense of property—which means the end of all things. The thought made him even more angry. He made his way through the grinning mob; their mouthings and gesturings irked him; he felt himself alien from these young people with their promiscuous friendliness, their indiscriminate fingerings and maudlings of one another. He saw four girls walking together, linked arms; they passed a group of men, one of whom sang, "Is there room for Mary here?" With surprising violence, Mary was pushed by her companions towards the witty singer, who clasped her in muscular arms. "Get away closer!" he yelled, hugging her the tighter. There followed furious struggling, frenzied screams, smacking kisses... then a bludgeon disaster, a gleam of white shoulder, and Mary broke away breathless and dishevelled, readjusting her dress with an unconquered show of anger.

Mr. Tod was now thoroughly roused. This must be stopped! What were the authorities doing? During the war a certain leniency was advisable; he wasn't so sure about reports; besides, on the whole, had not the war had a "purifying" effect? perhaps it had ended too soon? perhaps Mr. Churchill—Someone stumbled against him; he turned, furious. A lad, a crutch under his arm, his right leg a mere stump, was dancing with a sturdy girl to the strains of a mouth-organ and the laughing applause of the onlookers. It was a grotesque display, and it filled Mr. Tod with disgust. He passed on; it was quieter here, a sort of backwater where scattered groups indulged in a more maudlin type of flirtation. Three youths and a girl lounged against the fence; the girl was quite young, but well-developed. One lad, cigarette between his lips, fondled her with insipid solemnity. He did not speak; but removing the cigarette from his mouth, he spat, casually, and yet not without care, over the girl's head into the darkness beyond. The other two looked on, slightly bored as by a dull play. Suddenly, with a hurried word of apology, the amorous youth rushed away after another damsel, his place and function being taken by one of his friends with a nonchalance that paralysed Mr. Tod.

He felt physically sick; the precocity, the herd amorousness seemed to him horrible. "This," he muttered to himself, "this is what comes of education and leisure!"

He thought of his own irreproachable daughters, and pictured them in his drawing-room, playing the piano, or perhaps "halma"... And Mr. Tod thanked God. Then thinking of those others, he murmured, with righteous severity, "Young people have no business with such feelings!"

Mr. Tod had always scoffed when people talked of the dangers of adolescence; in fact, the word seemed to him slightly indecent, a subversive euphemism to excuse youthful laxity. Now he was sure that he had been right. A rising generation, on edge for sensation and gaiety, must learn to control appetite, to prion its emotions... discipline was the thing—discipline, and plenty of work; the forces of authority, of order, of routine. ... He turned for one last look; they were still there; he could see them through the dripping trees, still wandering round the bandstand. At this distance all was subdued; the violence and uproar, the howling and grimacing were no longer discernible; individuals were blotted out, merged into a continuous mass, which seemed to grope a painful way through a maze of bare and twisted boughs ... a languid procession of lost pilgrims, the vague complaining murmur of fretted souls ...

Mr. Tod passed along, wagging his head.

SICK-BED

Half dead with fever here in bed I sprawl,
In candle-light watching the odd flies crawl
Across the ceiling’s bleak white desolation;—
Can they not yet have heard of gravitation?—
Hung upside down above the precipice
To doze the night out; ignorance is bliss!
Your blood be on your heads, ridiculous flies.

Dizzying with these, I glare and taintialize
At the motley hides of books that moulder here,
"On Choosing a Career"; "Ten Thousand a Year";
"Ellis on Sheep," "Lamb’s Tales," a doleful Gay,
A has-been-Young, dead "Lives," vermilion Gray,
And a whole corps of 1790 twelves.

My eye goes blurred along these gruesome shelves,
My brain whirs Poems of ... Poems of ... like a clock,
And I stare for my life at the square black ebony block
Of darkness in the open window-frame.

Then my thoughts flash in one white searching flame
On my little lost daughter; I gasp and grasp to see Her shy smile pondering out who I might be,
Her rathe-tie rounded cheeks, near-violet eyes.
Long may I stare; her stony Fate denies
The vision of her, though tired fancy’s sight
Scrawl with pale curves the dead and scornful night.

All the night’s full of questing flights and calls
Of owls and bats, white owls from time-stuck walls,
Bats with their shrivelled speech and dragonish wings.
Beneath, a strange step crunches the ashpath where None goes so late, I know: the mute vast air
Wakes to a great sigh.

Now the murmurings,
Cricks, rustlings, knobs, all forms of tiny sound,
That have long been happening in my room half-heard,
Grow fast and fierce, each one a ghostly word.
I feel the grutching pixies hedge me round;
"Folly," sneers courage (and flies). Stealthily creaks
The threshold, something fumbles, terror speaks,
And bursting into sweats I muffle deep
My face in pillows, praying for merciful sleep.

THE RAY

(From the Italian of Severino Ferriari.)

On my thought a fair sun-ray smote and will not pass away—

While you bent above your sewing
And your needle, deftly led by your fingers, swiftly sped
Through your work, upon your hair
Fell a golden ray and threaded it with flame,
And a shimmer and a glowing
Were kindled in the air.
Then my heart said to me: "Now, a true immortal, she Is returning to the heaven whence she came,
And it irks her here to stay."

THE RELIGION OF PROGRESS

It is hardly possible that any one now under fifty should understand what it was in the eighties to believe in Progress. One escaped, as from a prison, from a nominal Christianity into a vision and an inspiration. Shelley joined hands with Darwin and Spencer. The whole world was moving, and mankind with it, beyond all doubt, almost without any effort, towards an event that hardly seemed "far off" and was certainly "divine." "Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive," and one could almost pity the disillusioned youth of to-day, that that heady wine is not for them.

For, in the interval, the golden chariot has descended from the clouds, and, coming nearer, has become darker, shabbier and more questionable. Were the horses hares after all, and Phaethon a not too sober cabman? So Professor Bury gently hints. And the Dean of St. Paul’s has no doubt about the matter. Progress, he says, was always a silly business—the kind of silliness it is the business of the Dean to expose. He does so with a good deal of intelligent wit; and then retires, in dignified ease, to his platonic heaven, whither this reviewer will not follow him.

Professor Bury deals in a competent way with the history of the religion of progress. He shows, what may still be news to many, how modern the idea is. For, in its full and comprehensive sense, covering the future as well as the past, it hardly dates behind the eighteenth century. He shows also how vague it was, in the minds of most of its exponents. Many volumes were written about it, but it was never defined. Perhaps nothing living ever is defined until it is dead. "Christianity," "Socialism," such things defy definition. So does progress, or rather did. From various passages one gathers, indeed, how Professor Bury would define it. He would say, it is a belief that human history has moved and will move, in a necessary and certain way, towards happiness. But not all the apostles conceive the end as happiness. Some emphasize knowledge, some morality, some liberty, some social order. In fact, a gospel of progress would need all of these, and more. For certainly some would wish to add art, and others love. The temporal goal of progress, like the eternal one of religion, must remain indefinite. For it depends on the blind impulse that urges men towards perfection.

Particular writers, however, stressed the particular points which appealed to them. The French were inspired by the growth of knowledge. It was the Mind that they saw advancing, and that in spite of what most of them regarded as the notable setback of the Christian era. As this view developed, other social facts were co-ordinated with intellectual growth. What men thought, that they did. It was Comte who worked this out most fully, elaborating the genial conceptions of Turgot and St. Simon. And his "Cours de philosophie positive," remains one of the great achievements of the human mind, though most likely it will never again find more than a handful of readers. The same intellectualism influenced the Germans. Only their Geist is something other and more cloudy than the French esprit. The Germans too, though they used history, were singularly contemptuous of it. "The philosopher," says Fichte, "follows the a priori thread of the world plan, which is clear to him without any history; and if he makes use of history it is not to prove anything, since his theses are already proved, independently of all history." That reminds one of Rousseau, who started an inquiry into the conditions of primitive man, and with the remark "écartons tous les faits." But that was not the French spirit, as, of course, it has not been that of Germany since the final debauch of Hegel.

English thought, as befits it, was harder than French, and soberer than German. The great contribution of England, indeed, to the religion of progress was unintended and illegitimate. For it was the biology of Darwin misapplied by students of society. The Darwinian theory was not one of progress, because it had no ethical standard. But it set species flowing, and as progress is a theory of flowing it was easy and irresistible to jump to the conclusion that the flow was upwards, although pessimists like Carlyle growled about Niagara. The conclusion was assisted by the assumption that acquired characters are inherited; for in that case the shorts of men towards Good are passed biologically to their descendants. That assumption was taken up into Herbert Spencer's system, the most grandiose of all the theologies of Progress; for it swept into its net the stary heavens as well as the destinies of mankind. It would be more easily seen that this philosophy was a work of the imagination, if there were any imagination in the author's style. But poets cannot read it, and scientists will not. It falls between all the possible stools, and very small men allow themselves the liberty of jeering at it. That solitary, obstinate, dogged, absurd figure is, nevertheless, one of those to which Englishmen would look reverently, if they had the habit of reverencing anything that is the concern of the mind.

Meantime, how does Progress now stand? Or, perhaps we should say, where does it lie, in what fragments, in what mass of blood? For the blood shed in the war was also its blood. For five years we have seen mankind relapse into a savagery unknown and undreamt of in any previous age. War, it is true, had always to be taken account of in the religion of Progress. But war in the past is easy to deal with. It is a record, hardly a reality. War in the present is a different matter. On this point, as on so many, the prophecies of Progress have been as vain as those of other religions. Conte, says Professor Bury, thought that "the epoch has arrived in which serious and lasting warfare among the elite nations will totally vanish." The last general cause of warfare has been the competition for colonies. Peace policy is in its decadence (with the temporary exception of England), so that we need not look for future trouble from this source." Yes! The Dean has cause enough to smile, if, indeed, smiling be the proper reaction. But the human mind is resilient and optimistic, deans or no deans. In the very midst of the war Mr. Marvin held a Summer School to discuss the various aspects of progress. Mr. Wells is now engaged in the attempt once more to trace it in history. While men concern themselves with their past they will concern themselves with this idea, but not again, if they are wise, as a religion. They must know specifically what it is they are looking for and ask critically whether it is really there. In Colonel C. R. Bigsby's book accounts of history ever written ("The Living Past") Mr. Marvin makes a good showing for the view that there really has been progress in two respects, knowledge and political unification. To demonstrate moral progress would be a more heroic enterprise. To suggest progress in art might be merely foolhardy. We must also consider the setbacks more candidly than did the earlier apostles. And we can no longer ignore, as they did, the whole history of the East. We know more, too, of primitive man, though it does not seem likely we can ever know very much. We can never again have a Religion of Progress, but perhaps, after sober and patient labour, we may recover a reasonable hope.

A NOTE ON NATURALISM

NATURALISM IN ENGLISH POETRY. By Stopford A. Brooke. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

THERE was, perhaps, no great originality in Stopford Brooke's criticism; and in reading this particular book one sighs occasionally for a page or two of precise discussion of the key-word in the title. On the other hand it has the redeeming salt of a genuine humanity, an enthusiasm which, if it attaches sometimes to what seems to us only dulled poetry, is in the main convincing—a book, in short, which can be read with pleasure rather than exhilaration, and which, considered as lectures delivered to a University audience, is admirable.

We may note in passing curious omissions in the historical argument. There is no separate discussion of Coleridge; indeed, no discussion at all. If only as the chief formative influence on the young Wordsworth, Coleridge was essential. Because there is no mention of Coleridge, Bowles of the "Sonnets" is passed in silence. Keats is neglected on two grounds: one, that his work shows no trace of the influence of the French Revolution, which seems to us irrelevant; the other, that he was confined to the pursuit of beauty (which is, we think, in any pejorative sense, untrue). There is no word of John Clare.

The question, however, that returns is: What is naturalism in poetry? It is the more important because there is no doubt that Stopford Brooke would have called himself a naturalist. His sympathy with the whole movement is continually peeping out, as when he says of Burns' poem to the field-mouse ("fellow-mortals"): "This will be the note of a really civilized society. It is not the note of our half-barbarous condition." To which, with a perversely delightful that it was Pope who said it, we are tempted to reply that the proper study of mankind is man. Indeed, our private opinion is that a civilization in which it was commonplace to speak of, and think of, field-mice as fellow-mortals, would be not half, but wholly barbarous.

The truth, as we see it, is that naturalism, which we would define roughly as the placing of what is not man in the same category as man, if pursued as an end in itself, is a pis aller. That man should take conscious delight in nature, and thereby expand his human experience, is desirable; but the case of English poetry is the end result of a deterio-ration, to indulge the dream that nature is something higher and better than he (an illusion which is generally accompanied by the further illusion that he, alone among men, really understands nature), is cowardly and retrograde. It follows then that love of nature must in the great poet be strictly subordinate to love of human beings. The precept of a true civilization is "Love thy neighbour as thyself"; neither field-mice nor daffodils are neighbours.

But this is moralizing? It will not be the first time we have said that literature is based upon a peculiarly stringent morality. In these self-conscious days we need to be most self-conscious about the thing which concerns us most—and hence about the conjuncture of the stars under which we were born, we should remember that our less energy is compensated by our greater knowledge. By taking thought we can concentrate instead of disperse it. Instead of spashing wildly about (under the licence of "experimentalism"), we have it in our power to discover almost precisely what we can do with the greatest hope of permanence and success. A generation which has so few arrows in its quiver must be more careful about taking aim. It is with a peculiar kind of despair, therefore, that we read the works of modern poets who embrace trees, invoke rivers, identify themselves with the force of gravity; it is all so well-mean, and all so wasted. A little more intelligence, gentlemen, please; economy of effort depends upon it.

M.
O student of the history of our literature can fail to have been puzzled by that century-long gap which separates the auspicious beginnings of the realistic novel in Elizabethan's day from the apparently new creation of the form by Defoe. Literary historians have the task of finding a father for 'the father of the English novel' but, in vain. Apha Behn's 'O oomoko' obstinately remains a romance, in spite of all that a rather wild criticism has had to say of it; 'Pilgrim's Progress' and 'Mr. Badman' are not the parents of Roxana and her tribe; they are at the nearest cousins. There were many writers in the second half of the seventeenth century, the scholars tell us, who fumbled after the realistic novel; but until the appearance of Defoe, with his highly perfected formula for the blending of imagination with fact, of lies with truth, as certain serious-minded moralists have put it, no one had succeeded in finding the form. It has remained for Dr. Bernbaum to show that Defoe was not without parents; that his method had been completely anticipated at last once, and, in all probability, many times, during the course of the seventeenth century. In the particular case of Mary Carleton he has definitely substantiated his case: it is left for further investigation to discover whether all the biographies of criminals, adventurers and the like, so numerous in the seventeenth century, are as definitely works of fiction as is the apparently convincing biography of the German Princess. If they are, then Defoe is merely the perfector of a method already well known and extensively practised. Dr. Bernbaum has made a genuine historical discovery.

The facts of the case are these. Mary Moders, born about 1635, and having two husbands living at the time of her notoriety, descended upon London in the year 1663, armed with a box full of sham jewellery and a highly romantic story, to the effect that she was a German princess fleeing from an odious proposal of marriage. On the strength of her jewels and her story, a young law student, named John Carleton, made love to, and married, the supposed Maria von Wolway. A fortnight later the truth leaked out. Mary Carleton was tried for bigamy, but owing to the incompetence of the prosecution and her own shrewd assurance at the trial, she was acquitted. The trial was productive of a number of pamphlets, two of which, by Mary Carleton herself, or, more probably, by some journalist friend of hers, put the adventure's case, and two from the pen of John Carleton, the case of her dupes. Her next public appearance (1671) was in the dock, accused of theft, she was sentenced to transportation to Jamaica, whence she escaped and returned to England, only to be caught stealing once again. This time she was condemned to death and duly hanged (1673). Her last trial and execution revived, as was natural, all the old public interest. Seven new pamphlets were published in the year of her death, one of which, 'The Counterfeit Lady Unveiled', being a full account of the birth, life, most remarkable actions and untimely death of that famous scamp, Mary Carleton, known by the name of the German Princess,' is the real subject of this monograph.

Of all the narratives of Mary Carleton's life and adventures, 'The Counterfeit Lady Unveiled' reads the most convincingly, the most truthfully. It is seriously and historically written, with no admixture of that vulgar satire, corresponding to the rather schoolboyish cynicism of the picaresque novel, which is to be found in so many of its rivals. It is full of highly circumstantial details; cause leads on to effect, motive to resultant action. Nothing could be more truthful in appearance (except, of course, a novel by Defoe), and indeed Francis Kirkman, the author of 'The Counterfeit Lady,' is for ever assuring us of his veracity, for ever citing his unimpeachable authorities. But he has not succeeded in taking in Dr. Bernbaum, who proves him to have been fully as great a liar as Defoe, and, though infinitely less competent than his successor, at least as conscious and deliberate an artist in fiction.

Kirkman's method was an ingenious one. He read all the pamphlets on Mary Carleton which had appeared, either in 1663 or in 1671 and 1673, and selected from them those incidents which seemed to him interesting, exciting or amusing. But Kirkman's sources were for the most part crude and incompetent pieces of journalism. Treating them with conscious art, he expanded meagre incidents with significant detail, and, what was a still more important artistic achievement, linked up disconnected anecdotes so that they formed a continuous life-history, in which every action has its due source in character and opportunity.

Let us take a characteristic example of Kirkman's method of writing biographical fiction. Mary Carleton, in one of her own pamphlets, published in 1663, had given a very circumstantial and elaborate account of her early life as a German noblewoman in Cologne. She says that she was seduced by a young nobleman from native Germany, and was wooed by "an old gentleman that had fair demesnes about Leige or Luyck, not many miles distant from Cologne, a man of serious gravity and venerable aspect for his grey hairs, but disfigured with some scars his youthful luxury had given him. He accosted me the rude military way, for he had been a soldado." And so forth. The whole of Mary's German story had been long ago discredited when Kirkman wrote his "Counterfeit Lady." He knows and recounts the true history of her early life at Canterbury and Dover. But at the same time he finds this soldado so picturesque that he has not the heart to get rid of him altogether. No, he is determined to have the soldado; 'that rotten hoarse cold and snuffling that he had caught, as he said, in the trenches of Breda, in the brigade of Count Henry of Nassau in Spinola's army,' was too good a piece of detail to be sacrificed to the ridiculous godless of truth. He preserves the soldado, and, by a stroke of genius, kills quite a number of other birds with the same stone. He makes Mary Carleton travel on the Continent, brings her to Cologne, makes her meet the soldado (with word for word the same rotten hoarse cold), makes the soldado mistake her, Mary, for the noble Maria von Wolway, makes Mary encourage the mistake for the purpose of cheating the soldado, and finally brings her back to England with a perfectly adequate and satisfactory explanation of her German Princess fable. The whole episode is one of the most convincing and truthful in the book. It is also the most completely invented. What is this but realistic novel-writing? Here, in "The Counterfeit Lady," we see Defoe's method practised with deliberate skill as early as 1673. It is highly probable, Dr. Bernbaum suggests, that most of the criminal biographies of the seventeenth century are really novels "founded on fact," like the novels of Defoe. Further research may confirm or disprove this theory. Or it may, which is unfortunately more likely, find itself unable to prove anything at all, since in the majority of cases there exists no known standard of truth with which the narratives may be compared. The case of Mary Carleton is exceptional in this respect, as a more or less "official" account of her trial is extant. From this we know roughly what were the true facts of at least part of her life. Still, it is possible that investigation may be able to establish the required standard of truth in other cases besides that of Mary Carleton. If the gap in the history of the realistic novel is not to be completely bridged, we have found in the story of Mary Carleton at least one firm stepping-stone.

A CORNER OF THE BLACK NORTH

THE NEW SENTIMENTALISM

M R. PECK is, in a very comprehensive and profound sense, a disciple of Mr. G. K. Chesterton. The fact that Mr. Peck writes as much like Mr. Chesterton as he can is merely the most superficial aspect of this discipleship, although the imitation, even here, is quite unusually courageous. He has not the verbal dexterity of his master; his style has not the rapidity and pungency of Mr. Chesterton's, but it is as often violent, as often inexact, and the sense is just as often sacrificed to the sound. But this is the trivial aspect of a striking resemblance. The centre of Mr. Peck's position is that society is returning, and must return, to a variant of the Roman Catholic teaching that it calls Free Catholicism, because only so can a man feel that he is a man. We quote a passage from Mr. Peck's description of Mr. Chesterton's attitude to Christianity, because we believe it to be a true and important description:

He felt that the universe with Christ crucified in it contained an infinitely richer inwardsness than any specimen of universe proposed by rationalists. He discovered that the Christian Faith stirs the pulses and uplifts the sinking spirit. He found it the foster-mother of strong champions and mighty heroes. He found that in its strength a man could accomplish the last, remote miracle, and actually be a man—and to the modern man that came with a sudden shock of surprise.

We find this passage very illuminating. It gives, we believe, the essentials of Mr. Chesterton's case and also (or therefore) of Mr. Peck's. No one can fail to notice that the appeal is wholly confined to the emotions, and this we believe to be profoundly true of the arguments of this school. Belief in Christianity is recommended as giving the believer a glorious feeling. Seen from this point of view, all the peculiarieties of this school are easily understood. Its apparent indifference to the truth about any given matter is the necessary outcome of its criteria; these criteria are feelings. It is, alas! quite frequently the case that the most reasonable account of a matter is not the most exciting; in all cases the emotional school prefers the exciting account. Hence an apparent disinclination, an apparent stupidity. Hence also the perception of deaths from melancholies. It is the outcome of the free exercise of the romantic imagination completely divorced from the scientific spirit. The opponents of this school too often try to refute its teachings by an array of facts and logical deductions. We can imagine Mr. Peck's arguments being treated in this way. But such a procedure would be irrelevant. Mr. Peck could retort, quite conclusively on his own premises, "You bore me." Probably the only reply which this school would admit to be valid would be to say that one had a different taste in stimulants.

THE ATHENEUM IMAGINATION, MILITARY AND ARTISTIC

GALLIPOLI DIARY. By General Sir Ian Hamilton, G.C.B. (Ardon 366. 1½.)

THE Gallipoli campaign of 1915, so far as this country was concerned, was the one complete incident of the war. It had a beginning, a development, and an end, so that it can be judged by itself from many points of view, as an object lesson in political strategy, as a classical instance of combined operations, as a tragic enterprise which in the high hopes and inadequate preparations of its outset bore the seeds of its inevitable disaster, or as a study in personality. Much has already been written, much already said, which will enable some author of the future, poet or historian, to regroup the scattered elements of this dramatic episode. Yet, in spite of the labours of a Royal Commission which, at the end of all, has only remarked what a number of other people had already expressed with vehemence, there is a great deal more that some Thomas Hardy of another generation would have to know before he could reconstruct for all time the characters and the tragedy. How much the personal element counted from beginning to end is proved by this diary of the Commander-in-Chief who led the campaign. It adds little to our knowledge of the main outline of events, but it throws many beams of light on the influence and relations of certain leading personalities, Sir Ian himself, Lord Kitchener, Mr. Winston Churchill, Lord Fisher, Sir John de Robeck, Sir Roger Keyes, Sir John Maxwell and others. This, alone, gives this book an intense interest, though not a new one to those who were out there.

Who could have been in proximity to the higher command and have been blind to the daily working of fallible human minds upon one another, minds on the peninsula, minds at Imbros, minds on board ship and minds in Whitehall? An honestly kept diary from such a position is positively explosive with personal judgments, and many such diaries, no doubt, will therefore rest for years on private shelves. There is more to come before these ant-like workings are made obvious to the Angel of the Pities. Sir Roger Keyes, for instance, must have a story to tell, but that story lies buried in the unpublished evidence taken by the Commission and in the Admiral's own cabin. Possibly we shall never know the true inner workings of Lord Kitchener's mind, for he entrusted them to nobody. So far as they could be observed, its outer manifestations were extraordinary. There were times when in despair one might have exclaimed that nothing which Lord Kitchener did or said, from the first moment when he gruffly gave the object "Constantinople" to the breathless commander of the Central Force, made for the success of the expedition. Sir Ian is fairly frank on this head, and nothing is more poignant than his revelation of loyalty, affection and admiration struggling against a dreadful conviction that his old chief was not the man whom once he knew, and worse, that so far as he was the man who improvised final victory in South Africa, he was unsuited, in spite of his remarkable vision of certain great truths, to be that anomalous combination of supreme commander and Secretary for War which for too long he was.

Many soldiers, we have no doubt, will criticize Sir Ian for taking up too much space in his diary with grouses, but the course of correspondence between London and Imbros was enough to exasperate a saint. To give one instance, not long after the landing, Sir Ian received a telegram from London asking what number of troops he would require to carry the thing through to a finish. He replied that he needed one Army Corps together with reinforcements to bring his existing force up to strength. Whereupon Lord Kitchener replied:

With reference to your telegram...I am quite certain that you fully realize what a serious disappointment it has been to me to discover that my preconceived views as to the conquest of positions necessary to dominate the forts on the Straits, with naval artillery to support our troops on land, and with the lettre de nad bombaidment, were miscalculated. A serious situation is created by the present check, and the calls for large reinforcements and an additional amount of ammunition that we can spare from France. From the standpoint of an early solution of our difficulties, your views, as stated, are not encouraging. The question whether we can long support two fields of operation draining on our resources requires grave consideration. I know that I can rely upon you to do your utmost to bring the present unfortunate state of the Dardanelles to as early a conclusion as possible, so that any consideration of a withdrawal, with all its dangers in the East, may be prevented from entering the field of possible solutions... .

In this extraordinary telegram there is personality with a vengeance, and little more than these few words is required to explain the whole failure in the Dardanelles. We inured a debt without calculating our resources, with the result that our hastily scraped together payments on account were always made too late.

But this is not the place to go further into purely military considerations. Those who were not in the Dardanelles will never adequately realize the position in which the force found itself, nor was it realized at the time. The contrast between the military and the artistic imagination, everywhere implicit in this book, is a point on which it is interesting to linger. For a fortnight after Lord Kitchener's telegram just quoted, no communication was received from him, and this was Sir Ian Hamilton's comment:

What a change since the War Office sent us packing with a bagful of hallucinations. Naval guns sweeping the Turks off the Peninsula; the Ottoman Army legging it from a British submarine waving the Union Jack; Russian help in hand; Greek help on the taps. Now it is our turn to leg it from the German submarine; there is no ammunition for the guns; no drafts to keep my Divisions up to strength; my Russians have gone to Galicia, and the Greeks are lying lower than ever.

Those hallucinations were part of the artistic imagination which, in its extreme form, is called counting your chickens before they are hatched. The advantage of taking Constantinople was seen; it was a fine flight of the artistic imagination. Sir Ian himself was inspired by it. "High, high soared our hopes," he wrote after a review of the French troops in Alexandria. "Jerusalem—Constantinople? No limit to what these soldiers may achieve." But the military imagination, which is properly exercised in seeing all the difficulties and providing for all possible needs, lagged all the time behind. The need for reinforcements on the spot, the possibility of a call for far more ammunition, the vital importance of avoiding even a day's delay, the probability of sickness if the campaign were prolonged, the necessity of providing camps, bottled, and proper rest camps to keep up the endurance of the troops—none of these things were foreseen, because of the too adventurous optimism, so far as the Army was concerned, with which the expedition started.

Sir Ian himself does not try to hide the working of the artistic imagination in himself. More than most commanders he was infected with it, and it is this very quality that makes his diary so vivid. It is not so much for its literary qualities—for these have been a little exaggerated—that the book is one to read, but for the insight which it gives into a mind extremely sensitive to impressions, not only of actual experience, but of the imagination. What he calls "the detachment of the writer", enabled him to look at his force, his superiors, his subordinates, and, above all, himself, as elements in a stirring picture. He could not write a telegram without seeing how it would look on Lord Kitchener's desk, nor a dispatch without imagining its readers. At every crisis he saw himself... and his men, little creatures faced with the incalculable, now exultant, now prayerful, now frightened, but preserving the proper picturesque attitude:

Almighty God, Watchman of the Milky Way, Shepherd of the Golden Stars, have mercy upon us, smallest of the heavenly Shining. Our star burns dim as a corpse light: the huge black chasm of space closes in: if only by blood...

These are the last lines of his diary two nights before the first landing. Some will say that no commander should have so picturesque a mind, but this one had, and he has not been ashamed to reveal it. He has exposed himself— it was a beau geste— to judgment from his inmost thoughts during his own lifetime. Each must form this judgment for himself, but this at least will be said of Sir Ian Hamilton, that he was never afraid and that he took his fate like a man.

SOPHOCLES AS A WILL-O'-THE-WISP

THE ICNNEUTE OF SOPHOCLES. With Notes and a Translation into English, proceeded by Introductory Chapters dealing with the Play, with Satyric Drama and with various cognate matters, by Richard Johnson Walker. (Burns & Oates. 69s. net.)

It is not only the price of this book that is impressive. The dedication to the Archbishop of Manila is a model of the epistolary style. When the Archbishop was Rector of the College of Irish Nobles in the ancient city of Salamanca, Mr. Walker sought and obtained permission to dedicate to him this work. Since that time His Grace has been successively Bishop of Zamboanga and Archbishop of Manila, a happy circumstance not only for his flock but also for the cause of learning, since, in this age of scepticism and materialism, when the spirit of Gallio is abroad, when mankind is deemed by certain so-called scientists no better than a fungus on an atom, when human history is treated as a negligible trifle, and the atmosphere of the age is infected with a worse than Eean virus, the herb moly lies in the bosom of the Church. Whenever a new church is consecrated, the Bishop traces in the dust the characters of two alphabets, the Greek and the Latin.

Way the Hebrew characters are not likewise traced, I think that I can explain: and, if I were wrong, you would correct me. But this is the not the place for such discussions.

We regret it, since Mr. Walker's answers to the many questions that he does discuss are so ingenious as to whet our curiosity. Never—to quote his own description of the recent course of Egyptian archaeology—never since the renascence of the Arts has so golden a harvest been gathered into the garners of scholarship as that which the once barren sands of Egypt have yielded to the scientific methods of a noble husbandry.

In fact Mr. Walker's conclusions are alluring and surprising. His enthusiasm is equalled only by his erudition and his eloquence. And yet, we fear, the methods of his husbandry are too novel to be recognized as scientific. If Egypt yields us a papyrus preserving (with some gaps and mutilations) precious fragments of an ancient drama, Mr. Walker's husbandry can make that drama grow and blossom. Where the papyrus gives us nothing more than an initial ñpsîon, Mr. Walker's method supplies us with a whole iambic line, which he is enabled to translate as follows:

Whether gone in privy flight from their fenced pasture, or else peradventure stolen, that thou so dost?

And although the miserable papyrus has no trace whatever—privil omnino textus—of the answer to this question, Mr. Walker knows:

Stolen verily, if I must needs say the same thing thus often.

Nor is it only when the papyrus is thus lost or mutilated that the novel method helps. Sometimes the text of the papyrus is intelligible, but, it must be admitted, somewhat dull. In that event the remedy is obvious. There is always a possibility of corruption; and for the novel method, possibility means probability, and probability amounts to certainty. It is delightful to follow Mr. Walker's process, and to see how the naïve ingenuity of what we thought was Sophoclean suffering transformation. There was a pious scribe who worshipped Pan of Panopolis in Egypt and could not bear to find allusions to Arcadian Pan in Sophocles. Accordingly, wherever Pan was mentioned in Sophocles, Mr. Walker has restored them. To our astonishment and happiness, the restoration of Pan to his right place transforms the play. The plot depends on Pan. Pan drives the Satyrs crazy, and so Apollo gets back from Silenus his golden staff. But then, of course, the golden staff itself (unfortunately for Sophocles) has fallen through a hole in the papyrus. Mr. Walker's skill has recovered it, and saved the play.

At the first glance, if you are sceptical, you may suppose it odd that where the manuscript has gaps, the style of Sophocles is something quite unlike what hitherto you thought was Greek—and quite unlike the style of the complement portions of the manuscript. The fact is that the whole play once was written in the manner of the gaps: the surviving part is corrupt and should be corrected. Mr. Walker will tell you how. To discover the authentic style of Sophocles Satyricus, you must first examine and amend the fragments of a certain Alexandrian, called Sositheus. Sositheus is said to have revived the ancient drama of Phlius. Accordingly, having found out what the style of Sositheus may possibly have been, you can infer that Pratinas, whom he may have imitated, may have written in a similar dialect. From this it is an easy step to the conclusion that Sophocles, and other writers of Satyr drama, must have used the same style as Sositheus, since Sophocles may well have imitated Pratinas. If the result is unpleasant, blame Sophocles, not science.

The range of Mr. Walker's investigation is much wider than the single play which gives its title to the book. Thespis is brought back from his eclipse. Sophocles recovers several forgotten works. The lost trilogies of all the great tragedians are in outline reconstructed. The early history of dithyramb and tragedy is rewritten. Choral metres and non-choral, vocabulary, stichometry, the book is a mine of learning and of brave hypothesis. We are breathless as we follow our impetuous guide. From time to time we seem to descry something of value in the mass of wild conjecture. Anyhow, we cannot steel our hearts against an enthusiasm so sincere; and when we are most inclined in the name of sound reason and good learning to protest, we are disarmed by the author's own admission, "certainties are for such as think them discoverable." For himself, he says:

Like the silly Cylicranian, I have driven my random plough through fields already ploughed; but unlike him I seem really to have found some cups, and one or two of them—who knows?—may turn out to be of gold.

We hope so. But when we feel inclined to read the "Ichnune" of Sophocles, we shall still think it wisest to have recourse to Mr. Pearson's edition of the Fragments.

J. T. SHEPPARD.

Fontes Historiae Religionis Persicae, by Carolus Clemen (Donn, A. Marcus & E. Weber), is a small book of 116 pages, the first volume of a series "Fontes Historiae Religionum," edited by the present author. The quotations range throughout the Classics from Xanthus, who wrote before Herodotus, to Nicephorus Callisti, c. 1320, and provide the student of the ancient Persian religion with many data on the subject as the Greek and Latin writers saw it.
HUXLEY and COMTE

Thomas Henry Huxley. By Leonard Huxley. (Watts. 3s. 6d. net.)
Auguste Comte. By F. J. Gould. (Watts. 3s. 6d. net.)

Huxley and Comte had little enough in common—the one was as discursive and experimental as the other was systematic and theoretical—but both had a kind of assurance which is rare to-day. Both men had a confidence in the influence of reason, a confidence, fundamentally, in human nature, which is quite unlike the feeble, transient flushes of enthusiasm we find in our contemporary intellectual leaders. Each of these men laboured to make clear a way of salvation; if this could be discovered and the message made plain, they did not doubt that mankind would follow it. They did not suffer from the agnosticism which is the creeping paralysis of our time. Unfortunately, our present malady seems to be the result of a knowledge and experience that these men either did not possess or that they found themselves able to ignore. We wheel our invalid-chair up to their lecture-rooms; we listen with sympathy, even with admiration, and when they address us directly with the tremendous command “Arise, and walk!” we may even totter a few steps...

Of these two men, it is Huxley who touches us more closely to-day, and that precisely because he stood for a principle and deliberately eschewed systems. His description of Comtism as “Catholicism minus Christianity” expressed exactly his twofold objection: it was, on the one hand, a system, and on the other it lacked a definite, informing principle. The description is not quite fair. Comtism has a principle, although, compared with such detailed precepts as the Christian catechisms enjoin, it may be rather vague. But in Comtism occurs the maxim “Act from affection, and think in order to act,” which is as sensible a principle of conduct as can be found anywhere. But it is true that Comte was, above all, the creator of a system, a Religion of Humanity, complete with temples, priests, rules and even a calendar. And Comte himself, who has, at all times, difficulty in winning our personal esteem, becomes frankly unsympathetic as he becomes more consciously a great Founder and Teacher. We can, perhaps, excuse his perpetual borrowings, even when he accepts all the little savings of his devoted servant woman, for we can, by an effort, sympathize with his conception of himself as a great philosopher that any man might be glad to die for in his support. But the arrogance for having his house and beliefs kept up just as he left them (at the expense of his disciples), the direction that he was to lie in state for sixty hours after his death, his mania for deference—this would look questionable to us even in the life of Gautama Buddha. Perhaps it was partly a remembrance of these proceedings that led Huxley to write: “Of all possible positions that of master of a school, or leader of a sect, or chief of a party, appears to me to be the most undesirable; in fact, the average British matron cannot look upon followers with a more evil eye than I do.” Instead of a system he had a principle: “Sit down before every fact as a little child, be prepared to give up every preconceived notion, follow humbly wherever and to whatever abyss nature leads, or you shall learn nothing.” It is the scientific ideal.

But although the two men differed so greatly, they were at one in their dissatisfaction with modern civilized conditions. Comte’s “Ni Dieu ni Roi” became for Huxley the reorganization of morality and society on scientific principles. It comes to the same thing. We, who are in a later stage of the comprehensive revolution they began, can see them as collaborators. We differ from them both in being less confident about the outcome.

WRITTEN ON AIR

R.F.C. H.Q., 1914-1918. By Maurice Baring. (Bell. 8s. net.)

It is difficult for the human to appraise this book, because the only word of approbation in it is unjustly directed at his head. There is for him only to acknowledge his grave transgression of prudence and ignorance, and read with humility how his crime was expiated by the heroic valour of the R.F.C., noting the while how great was the cost in men’s lives.

Major Baring had unique opportunities for observation and record; for he was, first, intelligence officer to General Henderson, and from, August, 1915, staff officer to General Trenchard. His particular genius inspired him to write this book with irreproachable taste, without sentiment, without adornment, without partiality, and with so profound an appreciation that the last word seems said, being the right word.

That culpable public neglect and Government parsimony led to the sacrifice of innumerable lives, that political interference delayed or prevented success in operations of strategy, is clear to careful perusal. Not all who run may read, but it will be a hopeful sign of intelligence and resolve on the part of official staffs set over Army, Navy, and Air Force cadets if this book is employed for their instruction and inspiration.

It is a document of desperate value—desperate because the first glamour of a fight to win was too often worn away by heart-devouring delays in supply of men and machines. But for the tenacity of will, the invincible optimism and unconquerable spirit of the whole Force, those marvellous and audacious enterprises could never have been achieved. It is common knowledge that the death-roll among officers in the R.F.C. was after the first few months larger in proportion than in any other branch of the services. Trained experts of a high degree of efficiency, and possessed of unusual qualities, were demanded in ever-increasing numbers to undertake work of a new order, with a huge ratio of risk. That these were forthcoming is to the nation’s lasting credit, and that they were commanded in so masterly a manner its infinite good fortune.

If a future and more resolute public asks why, of a period so critical as December, 1917—May, 1918, there is no record, it will learn that the cause was political intrigue, of which the Air Force was largely the victim. We must allow that a new arm in war must encounter difficulties of organization, strategy and tactics but its leaders should be exposed to irrefutable calumny or thwarting influences is for a nation to allow its own vital interest to be defeated. Major Baring offers no explanation of this gap of five months. His silence is sufficiently significant.

In contradistinction to some military books lately published, it is satisfactory to note the generous tributes of perception and admiration accorded to the French commanders. From what Major Baring says of General Castelnau and the French Air Commandant Du Puyty we could quote to the extent of unfairly revealing the book. The testimony to our own force is ample, too sacred to quote; and, indeed, their achievements are too numerous to be recorded, except in the memories of those intimate and irreparable private losses which form the nation’s proud tragedy. That their lasting names and deeds are written on that most changing element the air is both a paradox and reward.

The personal reserve of Major Baring regarding his chief is due, we are sure, to his concern for that chief’s taste in the matter. General Trenchard’s address to a squadron which had suffered great loss is its most honoured memory and a declaration of his own invidious principle.

THE BOOKS OF THE SMALL SOULS

THE LATER LIFE.—THE TWILIGHT OF THE SOULS.—DOCTOR ADRIAN. BY LOUIS COUPERUS. TRANSLATED BY ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATOS. (HEINEMANN. 7S. 6D. NET EACH.)

THOSE of us who are seriously interested in contemporary fiction cannot afford to disregard these admirably translated novels by the famous Dutch author. It is stated in an explanatory note that they can be read independently and separately, but that is, we think, to miss the peculiar interest of Mr. Couperus' achievement. True, the first book, which was published some years ago and which bears the covering title of the series "Small Souls," may be considered as complete in itself, but it is also the key to these three that follow after; and although, apart from them, it may and it does strike us as very brilliant, very sensitive and amazingly vivid and fresh, it is only when we look back upon it and see it in its rightful place in relation to the others that we recognize the full significance of the qualities we admire.

We do not know anything in English literature with which to compare this delicate and profound study of a passionately united and yet almost equally passionately divided family. Little by little, by delicate stages, yet without any preliminary explanations or reserves, we are taken into the very heart of the matter. The troubling question which would seem to lie so heavy upon the pen of many a modern writer: How much can I afford to take for granted? For how much dare I trust in the imagination of the reader? is answered here. We are too often inclined to think it may be solved by technical accomplishment, but that is not enough; the reason why Mr. Couperus can afford to dismiss the question, to wave it aside and to take everything for granted, is because of the strength of his imaginative vision. By that we mean it is impossible in considering these books not to be conscious of the deep breath the author has taken; he has had, as it were, a vision of the Van Lowe family, and he has seen them as souls—small souls—at the mercy of circumstance, life, fate. He has realized that that which keeps them together, the deep impulse which unites them through everything, is apprehension. The real head of the family, the given whose definition they never question, is Fear. So, as we speak of the idea underlying a poem, we may say that Fear is the idea underlying these novels. If we listen deeply enough we can hear this unquiet heart of the Van Lowe family throbbing quickly, and it is because it is never for a moment still that the author succeeds in keeping our interest passionately engaged. We are constantly aware of the vision, the idea; it is the secret that he permits us to share with him, and in the end it seems to give way to a deeper secret still.

In the first of these four great glimpses of the Van Lowe family the home is already empty. Some of the children are married with families of their own, and all are scattered, but the mother still has the power of calling them under her wing every Sunday evening; and here it is that we meet them all quickened, all stirring because Mamma has asked them to take back Constance, a sister who disgraced them and who has just come back from abroad because her homesickness was worse than she could bear. She has come back because she cannot exist without family life, that precious exchange of tenderness and sympathy, intimacy and ease. Her sin was that years ago, in Rome, she betrayed her elderly husband with a young Dutch nobleman, and there was a divorce. But he has been her husband for years and their son is now a big boy: Constance imagines that all is forgiven. Her own family, her own sisters and brothers, could not nourish a grudge against her. In their reaction to her presence among them we have the measure of the Van Lowe family, and we learn thus the real reason for returning was hers of them all, but that she had failed to find happiness in her second marriage and was not strong enough to face unhappiness alone.

It is astonishing with what power and certainly the author gives us, in this book, the whole complicated Van Lowe family, how he suggests their weakness under their apparent strength, their wastefulness under their apparent reserve. Paul, the exquisite, with his mania for order, and his sense of the exquisite wasted upon tires and the arrangement of his wash-handstand; Ernst, who lavishes his pity and sensitiveness upon ancient pots and books; Dorine, whom nobody wants, spending herself upon things that do not matter, and Constance, with her longing to be loved thwarted by her jealousy of her step-sisters. Apart from them there is Addie, Constance's little son, who looks at all that is happening with his grave, childish eyes and sees them as they are. This little boy, who is ten years old in the first book and is the Doctor Adriaan of the last of the series, is the hero, if hero he can be called. It is through him that Constance is received back into her family, and it is he who prevents his mother and father from making a tragedy of their lives. Until the last book he seems to be quite untouched by the terror of life and the weakness of the others. But in Doctor Adriaan, just when we imagine that if the burden is to be lifted it will be lifted by Addie, the famous young doctor, the healer, it is quite wonderfully suggested that he too has not escaped. He feels at times a sense of dreadful insufficiency. He does not feel strong enough to stand alone, and turns to his foolish, charming father for support.

"The Later Life" is concerned almost entirely with the blossoming of a late love between Constance and a man as old as she, side by side with the very first love of one of her nieces, Marienne. Under the spell of her feelings Constance becomes young again, but she does not become a girl again. Marienne, with her recklessness and her small laugh like a shake of silver bells, is cruel and violent. She must be happy; she will be happy. But Constance enters into a silent kingdom where everything is illusion and the air breathes peace. But the end, again, is like a question; it is a chord struck softly which does not close the phrase, but leaves us wondering.

In "The Twilight of the Souls" the chief figure is of one of the brothers, Gerrit, a great bluff, burly, healthy brute of a fellow who is haunted by the feeling that there is a worm with legs eating up his marrow. He has a charming little wife, nine little children, and everybody knows him and loves and laughs at him, and there is that worm—confound it—burrowing away with its legs and licking up his marrow. This is an amazing, masterly study in pity and terror. It is the flaming intolerable core of the book, and round it, retreating into the same shadow as he, the other Firmans, also live in Van Lowe. It is as though the menace that has threatened the family so long, the immense lukewarm family, is realized at last and the Lord spoon them out of his mouth. Yet how lingeringly, with what an art are they spewed! It remains in "Doctor Adriaan" to gather up all that are left and to put them in Constance's care. But with them is Addie's wife, a great insensible young woman who has no patience with their tragedies and thinks them all half mad. . . The Van Lowe family has fallen; Mathilda treads it under her heavy foot and it does not stir. Even Addie thinks it is time.

But space does not permit us to deal with these books at anything like their length. There is an angle from which we seem to see them as the strangest landscapes, small low-lying country swept continually by immense storms of wind and rain, with dark menacing clouds for ever pulling over and casting a weighty shadow that lifts and drifts away only to fall again.

MARGINALIA

FATE during these last months has demanded of me that I should go very frequently to the theatre. Inevitably, the spectacle of the stage as it has set me wondering and speculating about the stage as it might be, about that not impossible theatre where one is always entertained, surprised, refreshed and amused. For I am not thinking of uplifting plays, nor of tragedy (which, for reasons that are inexplicable, we have chosen throughout the ages to call the highest form of art), but simply of the entertainment that delights without instruction or any exertion on the part of the audience. In these entertainments—who can deny it?—the contemporary theatre is deplorably lacking. A dim uniformity is overtaking us. How many forms of entertainment of proved delightful have been allowed to decay from their old state of glory or to become altogether extinct? To reward us for winning the war we were given a Victory Circus. It was pleasant enough in its way, to be sure; but what a pale spectacle compared with the grand circuses of other days!

* * * * *

Looking idly through the files of THE ATHENEUM for 1830, I came upon the following description of an evening at Astley's Circus, when the great Ducrow and his future wife, Miss Woolford, danced a ballet on horseback:

The Circus on Tuesday evening presented a very agreeable novelty, 'The Shepherd of the Tyrol and the Swiss Millmaid,' performed by those accomplished equestrians, Mr. Ducrow and Miss Woolford. The lady first appears in very picturesque attire, having under her arm a milk-pail which in the course of a round or two she transfers to her horse. The swain comes cantering along after the maiden, and as he beckons to her from the opposite side of the arena, Mr. Ducrow managed to give so much effect to his gesticulations and, like a skilful artist, threw so much space into his picture that we could almost fancy him on the summit of the Dancer saluting his fair mistress, as she was enjoying the prospect from the heights of the Richel. Phillips is cow and flies at the approach of Damon; the speed of the she-hind, however, is greater than hers, and at length he over-takes her. The swain, dint of a few celerities, most prettily performed, and at last by the present of a beautiful bouquet offered on his knees, he prognosticates his fair enemy. . . . At length Damon episses a letter in the bosom of his Phillips—this he snatches and carries away with—the race is then inverted—Damon flies, at the top of his speed and Phillips follows, the former opens the letter and goes through all the pantomimic rage of the jealous—stricken lover—he tears the paper, his own hair, raves and stamps—Phillips implores in vain his rival to relapse and relieves his passion, she comes up to him, but her spirit is now up and she again avails her lover. Hence another pursuit, and at last a reconciliation takes place, the mounted mountaineer—embrace, and make their bow and exit.

It sounds quite enchanting. Why is it, I wonder, that nobody does such things now?

The circus today is all but dead, and, still more regrettable, the pantomime, gloriously flourishing in France during the years when Ducrow was making his fortune at Astley's, is now totally extinct. To realize what the pantomime was, what it might again be made, it is necessary to make oneself a little acquainted with the career of the two Deburau's, Gaspard and Charles, those mimics of genius who raised the pantomime to the level of the highest art and for half-a-century, 1820 and 1870, kept it secure upon its pinnacle. It was Gaspard Deburau, the father, who created out of elements already existing in the Italian comedy the pale figure of Pierrot—Pierrot the inspiration of Jules Laforgue, as well as, through no fault of his own, of most of the sentimentalists from the nineties onwards. Round this new Pierrot and the ancient ageless figures of Harlequin, Cassandre and Colombine, Deburau constructed a long series of wordless comedies which his son revived, embellished and added to after the elder's death.

The Deburau's pantomimes were a combination of acting, dancing and acrobatics. Their stage manner was very quiet; they were serious, pince-sans-rire. The elder possessed, moreover, a peculiarly grim and ferocious sense of humour. In his knockabouts with Harlequins, hunchbacks and other corpora vilia he used frequently to use his stick in real earnest, belabouring his colleagues unmercifully with all the time, a wink and a smile for the audience as though to indicate that it was all fun and make-believe. Many of his pantomimes contain episodes of uproarious grimness. Hunchbacks hide in ovens; all unaware the baker lights his fires. A little while later blackened objects are picked out of the oven along with the loaves. Corpses are propped up against walls in lifelike attitudes by their terrified murderers, and, collapsing, are secured, in position by means of stamp-paper attached to the head. Those who watched Gaspard Deburau with care attest that a very peculiar smile, a strange glint of the eyes were observable every time he had occasion, on the stage, to handle a razor, a pistol, or a sword. It is further worth recording that he committed a murder by rapping too smartly over the head a young man who had insulted him in the street. His literary friends, George Sand at their head, made so much noise in his favour that he was completely acquitted.

To this ferocity of humour, a characteristic belonging to many of the greatest comic writers, Deburau added a prodigious fertility in the invention of ridiculous situations and actions. Even in their written form many of his pantomimes are deliciously fantastic. Acted, they can only have been sublime. If there is any man now living capable of revivifying the skeletons of Deburau's pantomimes, it is certainly Charlie Chaplin. It is easy to visualize Charlie as Pierrot the scavenger in "Le Billet de Mlle Frances"—the consciously casual, deliberately irresponsible chiffronnier who picks up everything with his iron prong, from the rubbish on the stage to the conductor's hat; one can see him again as Pierrot the fisherman, who himself gets caught and swallowed by a whale; or in "L'Abbe Capitaine," where the time is 1640, but the bold sea-captain has to impersonate his brother, ravished away by an ancient English Miss, enamoured of his charms, first in a sea-fight and then in the rôle of bridegroom at a wedding. Should Charlie Chaplin's comic invention ever fail him, he will always be able to find inspiration here.

* * * * *

If there is any lesson to be learned from these entertainers of the past, it is this: that the art of wordless miming, whether tragic or comic, should be carefully taught, and that all comedians should, to some extent, dancers and acrobats. In the days of Gaspard Deburau the French Government insisted that every player in the little halls of the Boulevard du Temple should come on to the stage either on a tight-rope or with a "cart-wheel" or somersault. Wise and admirable law! An intelligent Government would have taken advantage of Dora to promulgate a similar edict for our own theatres. All actors should be able at need to play their parts on their heads—literally and not merely metaphorically, as too many of our jeunes premiers are only too ready to do. When all comedians can dance, tumble, balance, juggle, ride horses, and ventriloquize, how delightful an evening at the theatre will be! But, alas! it is impossible that all actors should acquire so many and so difficult accomplishments. Let us content ourselves with a more modest demand for a new Astley's, with a new Ducrow and a new Miss Woolford to perform equestrian ballets, and a new Théâtre des Funambules, with a new breed of Deburaus in a repertory of up-to-date pantomimes.

AUTOYCUS.
LITERARY GOSSIP

It is the intention of The Athenæum to devote a portion of its space henceforward to prose fiction. Though we are confident that in the long run we shall be able to put a short story or prose sketch before our readers every week, we are aware that it may not be possible in the early stages of the enterprise to find work of a sufficiently high quality. We prefer to put the situation frankly before our readers rather than disappoint them. Stories and sketches submitted to the Editor should not exceed 2,000 words.

Those who have read—and those who have not should repair their omission without delay—Professor Southbury’s “History of the French Novel” will remember that in the preface he bade farewell to the writing of literary history. The more pessimistic of us interpreted this as meaning that we could expect no more books from him at all. We are happy to learn that this is not the case. If we shall never have from him that “History of Wine” which, together with “A History of the Middle Parting,” he once contemplated, we shall have one of the appendices to it. We hear that “Notes on a Cellar Book” have been completed for publication.

Was Dr. Johnson a smoker? Seeing the question in the contents of the current Notes and Queries, we answered pretty confidently that he was not. Our confidence is not exactly shaken by the evidence brought forward by the correspondent of N. & Q. The Rev. George Butt, of Lichfield, wrote in a letter to Garrick on March 22, 1777, “There’s for you! Give this letter to Dr. Johnson to light his pipe by.” Apart from the fact that the phrase is, anyhow, proverbial, the sentence might just as well imply that Dr. Johnson had no pipe to light. It might, indeed, gain a little point.

In any case we seem to remember that Boswell had something to say on the subject. We cannot at the moment put our hand on the reference to Boswell’s dictum; but he quotes Johnson as saying:

> Smoking has gone out. To be sure, it was a shocking thing to blow smoke out of our mouths into other people’s mouths, eyes and noses, and to have the same thing done to us. Yet I cannot account why a thing which requires so little exertion, and yet preserves the mind from total vacuity, should have gone out. Every man has something to do with which he calms himself; beating with the feet or so.

That should be sufficient evidence that Johnson preferred beating with his feet. But we wonder whether in fact smoking was in the Doctor’s lifetime on the point of going out, and why?

That a poem should have a circulation of two million copies is almost incredible. Yet Messrs. Chatto & Windus inform us that this has been the fate of “The Bolshevik poem ‘12’” by Blok, of which they are to publish a translation shortly. Probably the miracle is explained by its being “a Bolshevik poem.” We have visions of a whirlwind of flying pamphlets scattered from the windows of propaganda railway trains; and we have a suspicion that there is more Bolshevism than poetry in “12.” Nevertheless, we are curious to read it.

We have received from Messrs. Dent the first three volumes of the King’s Treasures of Literature to which we lately referred in these notes. They fulfil all expectations: they are thoroughly well printed, on tough thin paper, and are of the handy size of the Temple Shakespeare. To produce in these days a volume such as “Prose and Poetry from the Works of Henry Newbolt,” 256 pages, of high literary quality, neatly caset in cloth, for 1s. 9d. has a touch of the miraculous. We have no hesitation in saying that the publishers are attempting a work of truly national importance in launching the series.

NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, June 12, 1920.

Whatever may be charged against our political ferment, there is no question that it has given an enormous stimulus to intellectual activity in Ireland. The Irish book-market, formerly regarded by publishers as scarcely worthy of consideration, has experienced, during the last season, an unprecedented “boom” and one hears now of contemplated enlargements of their enterprises by Irish publishers against the coming of the autumn season. I never remember, again, so crowded—one can scarcely say, perhaps, so distinguished—a musical season as that of the past winter and spring. The summer months have been devoted to establishing firmly the foundations of the Irish Musical League, recently founded on the model, and owing largely to the inspiration, of the Dublin Drama League. Perhaps in protest against the rigid conventionality of the Hibernian Academy, we have had a positive orgy of “one-man” picture exhibitions. And since Whit Sunday, when it was dedicated, quite a pilgrimage has been made to the Church of St. Joseph at Terenure to see Mr. Harry Clark’s east window in stained glass, beautiful in conception and execution—the drawings, as drawing for stained-glass work should be, conventional, except for the Virgin Mother, who has the face of an Irish peasant woman. We neither here nor not because of our continued political unsettlement I do not know, but little as midsomer approaches we seem to be reluctant to forgo our various artistic activities. Normally, by the end of May, Dublin is a desert watered only by those informal exchanges of mind which, while houses such as A’s remain as rallying-points, do not cease even in the most arid season. This year, however, even the dog-days have not altogether quenched us. The Abbey season came formally to a close at the end of May, and Mr. Lennox Robinson has fled to Spain. Thither they transport themselves, by the way, quite a number of our men of letters and painters. What the lure of Spain may be I do not know, unless it be that there is less, in a semi-revolutionary country, they look to find something in the same intellectual environment as here, with the added attraction of being au dessus de la mêlée. But at the Abbey Mr. J. M. Kerrigan, happily restored of late months to the company, is carrying on for a season of some weeks with a company, mostly composed of Abbey players, which like Johnson was enabled to make his début as a dramaticist, in a little sketch “The Wooling of Julia Elizabeth.” I suspect collusion between Mr. Stephens and Mr. Kerrigan in this matter. Nobody but Mr. Stephens seems to be able to write the kind of dialogue which—for the plot is of the sightless—no one can fathom the lower middle-class life as a dramatic success; but nobody but Mr. Kerrigan, to whom falls the chief share in the piece, in the part of a typical Dublin woman, could have achieved the “taking” Dublin accent which to admiration got the humour of the dialogue across the footlights without detracting from the essential tragedy of the episode.

The Hibernian Academy has closed its doors, and simultaneously an artist not before well known to Dublin, Mr. N. French McLachlan, has opened an exhibition in the Mills Hall. After the acres of paint in the Academy, I find a little exhibition like this, and the earlier one of Mr. Jack Yeats, where one has only some two or three score canvases, all hung on the line, at once restful and stimulating. Mr. McLachlan is a disciple of Greiffenhagen. I entered his exhibition with a certain prejudice induced by a catalogue with various “Observations on Art” appended in the style of “Only mediocrities progress; an artist revives in a cycle of masterpieces a thing of which he is the first of what the world, an unprecedented,” and by the artist’s announcement that he is “a bit of a rebel.” But I left it better pleased. His exhibition shows Mr. McLachlan as a portrait painter of much promise; his head of Mr. W. K. Magee has caught the elusive John Eglington—a difficult subject—almost to perfection; and he has some attractive landscapes. He has also a few arresting and interesting adventures in primary colour.

THE PRIZE ESSAY

ENGLISH LITERATURE SINCE 1914

"The artist," wrote the author of "The Daedal Fields," so long ago that he has probably forgotten the occasion, "creates the image of his own soul. When he sees the insufficiency of that soul, he can either remedy it, or take to criticism." One man at least, you are to understand, followed the way of salvation—even through a certain by-street that it had perhaps been better for literature never to have heard of; leaving a younger generation, intent on short cuts to Parnassus, to storm the critic's castle, stir up and scatter his assorted stock of values, his chiselled distinctions and traditional categories, and turn the fellow adrift in a world so crazed with advertisement that even the muses stagger.

And as if in any case his plight were not exacting enough, the catachism of war must needs augment the critic's difficulties. That ubiquitous ordeal he must reflect, raises in a myriad several cases the question of the ethical ought; answer to which is apt to be determined less by what men are than by what they fancy they would like to be. The common imagination—crucial element in all crises—working at first through an eclecticism not altogether involuntary, tends to evolve a type. The press and the music-hall are prompt to respond; the trained sense of the popular in journalists, variety artists, official propagandists, publicity experts of all descriptions, combines with the widely-felt impulse of sincere patriotism to define an ideal—an ideal soldier, an ideal nation, an ideal war; which things, bearing no necessary relation whatever to reality, possess the essential quality of being bearable; they are a way of escape. So only can common humanity endure to envisage itself; so only can its innate possibilities be drawn forward to the plane of the effective, the admirable, even the heroic. Talent of all sorts is drawn into the vortex—not parasitical talent only, but all such as by lack of intrinsic originality, or by intuitive sympathy with the divine average, interprets the thought, the fancy, the passion, of the common mind. Vesta Tilley, Bruce Bairnsfather, "Sapper," "Bartimeus" and the lesser tellers of tales, Ian Hay with his hundred thousand, Kipling and Robert Service, Donald Hankey and the author of "Peace of Mind"—all these, and countless others, have here something in common, all as direct cause, effect of the great manifestation. Such work is in a psychological sense occasional; it does not arise post hoc from the literal reality of war. At its lowest it becomes the easy medium through which knaves and tyrants debase the currency of ideals; at its highest it aspires to the plane of epic, of genius so-called national; or failing that—as in fact it does—attains, at least, lasting merit in the fine won sincerity of Laurence Binyon, the disciplined sentiment of Maurice Baring, or the perfect attitude of Rupert Brooke—"through whose brain, as through the last alembic, is distilled the refined essence of that thought which "—not the gods, but the crowd, first conceived.

The process by which the Ersatz becomes—or is made—a substitute for real thought and true perception when our natural life is ended belongs rather to sociology than to criticism; but of such specifically war literature as it has evolved there are two relevant considerations: first, that by the very nature of its inspiration such work tends to speak in the language, to follow the formula, of an age that is already dead—a tendency difficult for even genius to overcome; second, that the whole vision in which it participates may be, for reasons which allow no brief definition, inadequate. The cruel realities of war break through it, in such cases as can be observed, with disintegrating effect; and the inevitable reaction takes the direction of a salutary insistence on the ugliness of certain facts.

Salutary, we say—borrowing from hygiene a term that is without significance to art. Essential as the smashing of sham idealism and perverted attitudinizing may be to individual and to national health and sanity, the service is not in itself such as literature need esteem; nor so far as reaction alone is its motive can its method have more than an accidental interest to criticism. The fact that certain young and passionate minds, confronted perfecve with the naked ghastliness of war, have in making of it what they could make something significant, arresting, amazing even, does not necessarily oblige art to them. Despite the perennial fallacy of modernism, the employment of a more or less literary technique does not suffice to determine the value of the product as literature. The critic, faced with the attempt to coerce words to a task for which, if the technique of literature be not suitable, that of other arts is still less so, may indeed decide that the sheer temerity of H. E. Read is more compelling than the rhymed Marinetti of Robert Nichols or the sophisticated realism of Graves and Gibson; that while his passion gives pungency to the virulent etchings of Sassoon it also lands him at times, by its very fury, in the attitude of the inarticulate gutter-urchin spitting in the face of destiny. But if the scale of values applied to this phase, or indeed to the whole of modern realism, is to be that of great literature, other criteria than mere success in the presentation of mood and matter become relevant. Questions of what mood? what matter? are then no longer to be ignored. Reality then leaps above the plane of immediacy. Ultimately, in art as in life, there is no escaping the soul.

And with so much at least of the critical premises left standing it becomes possible to widen the view a little. Perfect art, through all change of circumstance, remains the apotheosis of absolute reality; there is no other—no, nor ever will be. But the reality so expressive does not stop short at phenomena, the truth of accidents, of individual reactions; it reaches down to the very being and source of apprehension underlying even the soul. And the perfection of art so postulated is not achieved merely by the quest of the significant aspect, the "exact word," the perfect cadence: it demands nothing less than the lifelong discipline of the whole willing, thinking, sentient being.

Of this discipline that of technique is only the more patent and the more controllable part; but it is the part on which the renascence of the last decade was inherently bound to concentrate attention. The secret of that renascence—if indeed it were a secret at all and not something more familiar to mystics of all ages than its present votaries would allow (I heard, said St. Martin, flowers that sounded, and saw notes that shone)—lay in the approach to truth by intensity of contemplation of any one of its myriad facets: the adoption towards phenomena of the attitude of the child watching a painted gauze drop-curtain behind which at any moment the lights might go up and wonder on wonder reveal itself of beauty and terror and romance. Naturally there has followed a transvaluation of the old aesthetic values; the field of significant experience has suddenly become wider and the evocative power of word and image correspondingly enhanced. Not merely has the technique of craftsmanship gained new resources, but the technique of perception—the raw material, as it were, of creative work—has been amazingly developed. And consciously and exquisitely as never before do young poets ride to town on the top of an omnibus, or take a week-end in the country, or walk down streets, or gaze out of windows, or traverse the crowded streets, or enter rooms (having learnt the gait from Lewis) or listen to music, or revive their earlier infancy: create, in short, the images of their own souls; but unfortunately it is the critic, in receipt of such pièces de vertu almost by the dozen, who is the likelier to see the insufficiency of them.

For granted an enhanced delicacy and intensity of perception in much of the poetry of the period, granted an almost amazing development in synthetic vision, these things are but the beginnings of great art, and the opening-up of a new avenue to perfection that does not displace the ultimate goal. Alike in the delightful frescoes of H. D., the fifteen words in which Drinkwater captures the June morning, the charm of Ralph Hodgson's address to the things he cares for, the sheer magic that in de la Mare's lyrics, in Graves' "Star Talk," in Monro's "Overheard on a Salt-marsh," evokes the echoing overtones of word and image is not the individual mode that matters, but the strong feet of beauty that follow, follow after. And of the greatest poetry even such beauty is but one constituent. The question of reflective content, though not separately distinguishable—great art being the fusion, not the assemblage, of excellences—will not be dismissed as irrelevant; and for response we must still turn to the older men—to Hardy, to Robert Bridges, to Masefield, to Sturge Moore. In Hardy's lyrics alone is audible that music in which fine thought transmuted into pure emotion becomes articulate; but the sublimation in poetry of the fullest knowledge how attainable is an ideal towards which the poets we have named, and with them such young writers as T. S. Eliot and F. S. Flint, are well to turn. For with a language plastic and potent as never before, with keener perceptions and a scrupulous self-consciousness, with the ears of two continents vigilant in an almost overstrained attention, modern poetry yet leaves the missing word unspoken.

For an adequate conception of human life in its enigmatic environment of fate and circumstance we must look at present elsewhere than to poetry. The impression of finality—the finality of Sophocles or Ibsen—evoked by the recollection of sublimity beyond beauty and ugliness, beyond pain and satisfaction, beyond good and evil, is set at present only upon the work of Joseph Conrad. In the comprehensive survey of a period there is of this work little that can be said. Like all great art, only to a very limited extent will it tolerate the application of relative standards; and the absolute values itself expresses better than any critic can. There may, however, be drawn a comparison between the mode in which its conception of life is presented and the approach to the larger themes made in the endless books or monologues or memoirs with which H. G. Wells' latest phantoms concern themselves, or, more generally, in what has come to be called the psychological novel; and the comparison illustrates the peculiar difficulty with which the latter medium has to contend.

Just as the enrichment of what we have called the technique of perception has temporarily embarrassed poetry, so has the development of a mode of analysis—has embarrassed fiction. From the truism that a good novel will not express false psychology it is easy to pass—as in fact a large public and some authors have passed—to the fallacy that sound psychology will itself constitute excellence in a novel. There are, let us admit, situations in psychology of which an imaginative treatment is legitimate and serviceable; there are others—and Beresford himself in "God's Counterpoint" has found one—in which it is not. But while in the latter case the discrepancy will suffice to damn the novel, the former will not necessarily save it. And in general, the use of the imagination in the service of the method, if you will, of hypothesis in excelsis—is not a sufficient formula for the novel as literature. Courageously and well as Beresford, Cannan, Swinnerton and Wells have at times used it, the literary merit of their work inheres rather in its cognizance of certain more fundamental criteria.
Of these something like that energy, surprise and delight in the discovery of life which Walpole identifies in Conrad's genius, has led Compton Mackenzie, who sees life very differently, to his true métier in comedy.
The ability to create character and situation for the sheer joy of it, to do so well enough to communicate some sense of that joy to the reader, implies not only that an author has mastered his technique, but that (unlike Dorothy Richardson) he knows what to do with it. Mackenzie, like other young men, has had his aberrations; but he has the sense of beauty, he has a genuine fondness for the unique spectacle of humanity, and if he can avoid the trivial and outgrow the perverse he may do much to clarify the ideal of the novel.
For, develop how it may, there is one essential principle of the novel as literature: namely, that the imagination be not subordinated to, or eked out by, any other impulse. It must not remain merely the vehicle of a sociological or psychological or political or personal preoccupation. Whatever the philosophy or the passion behind it, creative work must exist, if at all, primarily in its own right. And the most promising tendency of recent fiction is the endeavour distinctly traceable in the work of certain writers to transcend the limitations of a purely critical interest. Katherine Mansfield in two studies of unique quality, Eric Leadbitter, Sheila Kaye-Smith, Brett Young, Joseph Hergesheimer, present each a vision of life that is intrinsically worth contemplating; and even in the fantastic satire of Norman Douglas the merit lies in the imaginative work being well done.
The scale of the vision: the style, not of the expression, but of the conception—that is, in fiction as in all art, the final test. Here is scope for much misapprehension.
It should be platitudinous to remark that in the portrayal of a single soul—one's own, perhaps, by way of "remedying the insufficiency"—a greater conception may lie implicit than in addressing the most comprehensive themes; that it is not so is due largely to the war-born popularity of efforts to "document" society. Such attempts as those of Stephen McKenna, W. L. George, Arnold Bennett, and H. G. Wells, are, as M. Aldington observes in his account of national life, are always more likely to result in brilliant journalism than in great fiction. As such they have their value—and perhaps attain their object; but by the side of "Anna Karenina," or of Merej-kowski's "Peter and Alexiz"—a book that has yet to receive adequate appreciation in this country—they recall irresistibly the contrast between the film and the drama.
Hugh Walpole, in his two Russian novels, has at least succeeded in evoking the same fundamental reality that Paul Nash captures in his paintings of the Western Front; and the achievement might have been still greater had the author been able, without loss of interest, to discard the use of the first person in narrative. It may be relevant to more books than this to suggest that, after all, the legitimate use of the first person is that made by Swift and Defoe; that otherwise, pace Mr. Wells, it is apt to become a snare and a subterfuge for the modern novelist—precisely the kind of subterfuge that Wells has been reduced in war-time to employing.
These are perhaps hard words to use of one who has laboured much, if not finely; but it is Wells' own past achievement that demands them. In "The Soul of a Bishop," in the "Undying Fire," in the "Research Magnificent," Wells has essayed the very loftiest of themes:
the soul's relation to God, the destiny of man, the fate of a nation; and the attempt is so ill-considered as to result in neither essay nor novel nor allegory nor any other thing known to literature. A writer so eager to express himself that he cannot be bothered (it is not a question of ability) to make proper use of the means he has himself chosen, ceases, whatever else he may become, to be an artist. His work amounts to an abuse, not a use, of literary form. If we are really intended to take, for example, the opinions of Benham as an independent contribution to thought their form should be that of the essay; but if not, if they are to be viewed as having a certain dramatic as well as intrinsic significance—and why else Benham?—their mouthpiece should have at least enough cogency and probability for us to believe in him. With no more success does Wells resort to allegory; there again this question of form arises, allegory demanding a detached and chastened style of word and thought of which Wells has never pretended to be a master. The essay, proper vehicle of fine personal thought, would seem to be the obvious mode for much of his recent activity; but this form demands a delicate appreciation of the true uses of intellect and imagination which neither Wells nor his age has troubled to cultivate.
For the age, however, there is perhaps some excuse.
Civilization, reding onward from convulsion to convulsion, cannot pause to notice the exquisite art of the essay.
Your would-be essayist must bowl, or attitude, or traverse his vocation to the vendering of nostrums (mostly quick), or even—shades of Tuchfeldröckh!—to the vendering of clothes. Yet, like all true forms, the essay survives; and J. M. Murry in a book on Dostoevsky to which in critical merit neither its author nor anyone else could show a recent parallel, and Sturge Moore in sane and sensitive appreciations of poetry, have served it well. There are signs in current literature that a revival of the essay, were it but practically possible, would do much to meet the literary need of the time. But the time has more urgent needs that are barely compatible with the satisfaction of a purely literary one.

And on what is perhaps the supreme synthesis of all forms—the drama—the burden of civilization has pressed almost to suffocation. Bernard Shaw, it is true, can yet find air enough to protest in the kind of work that Tchekov, rewriting the "Wild Duck," with the collaboration of Miles Milleson, might produce; Drinkwater can find a place on London's board, and Becket will attend one good new play. But that fine dramatic work is so little forthcoming is due simply to its proper school being not the study, but the stage; and the stage is required to meet other demands of civilization. Over the whole future of literature these demands project a shade of uncertainty.
This nation, victorious in its greatest war, may justly expect to reap some measure of the realities it has been led to fight for. In that event, literature, along with other finer activities of the spirit, may find itself for years to come the poorer. There remains the hope that as in the court literature filled not unworthily the redemptive role of art, so in the difficult sequel its strength and sincerity may assuage to this people the bitter fruits of victory.

WILLIAM ORTON.

The French Academy has elected M. Joseph Bélier to the chair vacant by the death of M. Edmond Rostand. M.
Bélier received 29 votes, M. Francis Jammes 8, and M. Paul Fort 2. M. Bélier's work on the Chansons de Geste ("Légendes Epiques") is of European renown. He succeeded Gaston Paris as Professor of Medieval French Literature at the College de France.
It is interesting to note that the Tribuna, June 14, announces that Signor Benedetto Crozé will certainly be the Minister of Education in the new Italian Ministry under Signor Giolitti.
THE HUMAN INTEREST

THE END OF THE WORLD. By Joseph McCabe. (Routledge. 6s., net.)

The title of Mr. McCabe's book is not very pertinent to its contents, but we were inclined to approve of his choice, since it is not an unfair title and might serve to attract readers. But will it, in truth, attract readers? The cover wrapper states that the purpose of the book is to give "the present position of science in connection with the End of the World." Are there many people who bother about the end of the world? Surely one of the most remarkable things about men is the narrowness of their interests. They live on a small planet circulating round one moderate-sized star in a universe of millions of millions; the whole human adventure occupies but a moment in the life of that universe. The mystery of life, of man's destiny, must be envisaged in that setting. There are moments when the ordinary occupations of men seem designed by some jesting devil. But these moments are not long sustained. The comfortable assurance of man's supreme importance, of "the essentially respectful attitude of the universe towards his moral code," as a recent writer puts it, has so high a pragmatic value that it is almost impossible to get along without it. Perhaps the realization of this fact, as much as sheer stupidity, is responsible for what Mr. McCabe calls the "foolish smiles" of his hearers when he lectures to them about "millions of years." With some men, indeed, there is a fear-inspired hatred of science, particularly of Astronomy, although the irreverent attitude of modern psychology is also arousing much opposition. We need not concern ourselves with the rationality of this dislike; we might point out that a soul is worth more than any number of tons of incandescent metals, but perhaps in doing this we should not be quite sincere. It was undoubtedly easier to hold certain beliefs about man in a pre-Copernican world than it is now, whatever the logical basis of the difficulty may be.

But while we do not belong to those who refuse to play any part unless it be the leading part, we are equally unsympathetic to those who describe man's "littleness" with malice. It sounds true enough to say that the earth will ultimately become too cold to support life, that the sun will grow dark, that the human race will become extinct and all its achievements utterly perish. So far as science at present knows, the whole human adventure is meaningless. There are some strangely bitter writers who seem to exult in this; such exultation is quite unimaginative; such writers are as parochial as the opponents they hope to wound. But even in men of good faith so cosmic a melancholy is not necessary. As Mr. McCabe points out, science grants the human race a future on this earth of some millions of years. If such a vista does not satisfy us, we can escape the thought of final extinction by postulating any degree of scientific knowledge that we please. Whether or not "progress" has occurred, it is certain that change occurs, and that scientific knowledge, and power derived from it, has enormously increased within a few centuries. We cannot say what limits there are to man's knowledge and control of nature; we can set no bounds whatever to the possible achievements of the next few million years. We cannot even say what we mean by the "human race" of a million years hence. If we are concerned about the extinction of our kind of man, it is possible enough that he will be extinct long before our posterity comes to an end. When it is not merely a translation of a desire for personal immortality, there is something a little fatuous about this gloom concerning the fate of the race. We need take little more interest in the fate of the last man than in the fate of the last Martian. It is at least probable that anything we could recognize, our art, our morality, our religion, even our science, will not have to wait until the earth is cold for extinction. The only people that one can understand looking forward to the cessation of the race with any real personal interest are those philosophers who have discovered the Absolute.

It is for this reason that we do not find the "human interest" in Mr. McCabe's theme that he imagines it to possess. He is like a novelist who has mistaken the nature of our interest in his characters. Mr. McCabe has got hold of the wrong corpse; such phrases as "and some day a dull-red sun will faintly gild the planetary tombs that circle round it until they are gathered again into its womb," leave us dry-eyed. But these little spurs of rhetoric are merely incidental; by far the greater part of the book is concerned with modern speculations regarding the structure and evolution of the sidereal universe. There are but few branches of modern science where speculation is more attractive and less satisfactory.

There are three or four main lines of investigation, each of which proceeds on quite reasonable assumptions, and they reach conflicting results. There are good reasons, for instance, urging us to relate star age with spectra. Different spectra, when properly arranged, do, on the whole, glide into one another in a smooth and satisfying way. It is natural to relate the corresponding temperatures with age. But, starting from quite different assumptions, an equally reasonable relation is made out between the speed of a star and its age. The two lists do not agree. When we pursue the subject into details we find still further complications. We have reached a stage familiar enough in the history of science; we may have confidence in the history of science itself and the devoted labor of its will find their place in a broader generalization. Mr. McCabe frankly points out the difficulties, but he does so with a slightly nervous air. Apparently there are a number of sceptical people, known to popular lecturers, who are always on the look-out for inconsistencies in scientific theories. This irreverent spirit worries Mr. McCabe. He points out that modern astronomers are not really all at sixes and sevens, that there are certain things on which they are all agreed. We admire Mr. McCabe's humility, his democratic spirit, but we fear he is wasting his time. The obvious and simple fact is that the people he has in mind are not interested in science; there is a certain lack of humour in taking their objections seriously. It seems that Mr. McCabe has not quite rid himself of the point of view proper to a Churchman—of a "body of doctrine" backed by "authorities." The scientific outlook is different; it asks you to criticize the teaching and to come to a different conclusion if you reasonably can. So all Mr. McCabe need do with his next audience of scoffers is to ask them for their own explanations of the facts. He might find a rebel as reasonable as Einstein, of whom, by the way, Mr. McCabe does not seem to have heard. There is a passage in Mr. McCabe's book which does not seem consistent with the date—1920—of publication, more especially as he says that its contents are based on the papers which have appeared in "expert journals." "I have, down to the unsatisfactory," he writes. Einstein's results have been in the expert journals for the last three or four years, and in ordinary journals for about a year. Mr. McCabe has written an interesting book, but it is not quite up-to-date. Its information is not quite the most recent and its spirit is not quite modern. But it is, nevertheless, an interesting and fairly reliable summary of contemporary astronomical speculations. Something might have been added, but there is very little that should have been taken away.

ARISTOTELIAN.—June 7.—Professor Wildon Carr, Vice-President, in the chair.—The Rev. A. E. Davie read a paper on "Aesnul's Problem of Truth and Existence."

The famous proof of the existence of God is not purely ontological, but rather the verification of a specific mode of experience termed "Faith." In Aesnul's view it is "Faith seeking understanding," and by Faith is meant a mode of immediate apprehension, awareness of God. Two stages are distinguishable in the reasoning. The first seeks to prove that we must think of ultimate reality in terms of existence; the appeal is to logical thought. In the second stage Aesnul proves that this ultimate reality is his Personal God. Here the appeal is to experience. The argument implies that truth and existence are two ultimate forms of reality; existence is the reality of things, truth the validity of thought-contents; hence truth must be sought in terms of validity. This is the logical character of the "proof." We can "only know as perfectly as possible." We know existent reality only as our thinking is valid, and we cannot think validly unless the God validly exists. Between these two ultimate forms of reality is presupposed a fundamental agreement, such that the relations of thought validly represent the real relations of things. For Aesnul such agreement has its ground in God. A second implication is that when thinking is valid it starts from existence, in the same sense that its contents are occasioned by existing reality. So that without experience we cannot know. The ethical character of the basic conception of God proves it to be a mere thought-product—that is, knowledge presupposes a mode of reality dissimilar from itself.

ROYAL NUMISMATIC.—May 20.—Sir Charles Oman, President, in the chair.

The Rev. E. A. Sydenham read a paper on the bronze coinage of Nero. The main objects of the paper were to show that Nero's bronze coins were struck at two mints—Rome and Lugdunum, to consider the status of the latter and its relation to the metropolitan mint, and to tabulate, according to diverse legends and styles of portraiture, the coins that may be assigned to the two mints respectively.

The evidence for the existence and operation of the Lugdunum mint from A.D. 20 to 68 was given at length. The criteria for determining the mintage of Nero's coins were considered in detail. The seventeen styles of portrait were illustrated and the forms of legend tabulated. Certain important deductions were made from the forehead and hair, to the date of the coins and changes in the working of the mints. In a few cases the styles of the two mints appear to overlap. Explanations of this were suggested and considered. It was hoped that the differentiation between the products of the mints of Rome and Lugdunum outlined in this paper would lead to a more scientific classification of Nero's coins than has hitherto been attempted.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—June 3.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

The following were elected Fellows of the Society: Mrs. Eugénie Strong, Miss Rose Graham, Canon T. A. Lacey, Rev. A. H. F. Bouguet, Col. E. St. C. Pemberton, Messrs. W. Garnet Benham, Herbert Chitty, H. J. Fleur, T. E. Goodyear, Charles Johnson, Frank Lock, and F. H. Mink. Dr. Aimé Ruttet, of Brussels, was elected an honorary fellow.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Mon. 21. Aristotelian, 8.—"Memory and Comatation," Miss Beatrice Edgell.

Geographical, 8.30.—"Through South-West Abyssinia to the Major L. L. Henth."

Tues. 22. Roman Studies (Burlington House), 4.30.—Annual Meeting; Paper on "Roman Antiquities recently added to the British Museum," Mr. A. H. Smith.

Linnean, 5.—"Recent Researches on the Antarctic Flora," Dr. C. J. F. Scoffset; "The Caithness Stone, New Zealand, and its Biological Function," Dr. R. J. Tillyard.

Fine Arts

MR. ROGER FRY

M ost people, myself included, find it difficult to look at Mr. Fry's pictures without thinking of his artistic history and his opinions. Just as Newman wrote "the Catholic," so Mr. Fry wrote "the Roman," as he converted to something which is commonly called Post-impressionism. To many this is the main point for or against him; and his pictures are merely examples of the salutary or awful effect of his conversion. He himself is a propagandist by nature; he writes as the advocate of a cause; and so many see in his art merely advocacy. They ask themselves, not whether these pictures are good or bad, but whether this is the right way or the wrong way to paint. Unconsciously they assume that he paints thus to recommend this way of painting, and they think about the method more than they look at the pictures.

But, of course, method is nothing in art, and, if you see only method in Mr. Fry's pictures, you see nothing in them. Works of art cannot be classified; each one, if it is a work of art, is, like the Angels according to St. Thomas, a species by itself. Now, looking at Mr. Fry's pictures in the mass as one can see them now in the Independent Gallery (7a, Grafton Street), I find that some of them are species by themselves and some do merely illustrate a method. It is clear that Mr. Fry, with his sudden and conscious change rather late in life, has not grown in art as a tree grows or opened like a flower; there has been some obstacle to expression which he has tried to overcome by will and thought. But this does not mean that he has had nothing to express. The same thing happened to Gluck in music, also late in life. He saw that he was on the wrong lines, and he, in truth, put the matter out and found the right ones. Has Mr. Fry done this?

Anyone, I think, who forgets him and looks at his pictures, will see that in some of them he has; but I am not sure that he himself knows which these are. I have myself still a desire to convert him to what I believe is his own true love; to take him up to his portrait of "N. H." (13) and the portrait called "La diligente" (7) and the portrait of "Mlle. L." (33) and some landscapes such as the "White Road" (51) and the "Farmyard" (77), and to say to him: "This is what you were born to do; don't let any puritanical scruples keep you from doing it." For Mr. Fry has always been a puritan in his attitude to the visible world, a kind of Joseph to its allurements, yet human, not a perfect Joseph. Now and then, more and more often, he yields, without perhaps being aware of it. The fact, whatever it may be, carries him off his feet; and he makes love in his picture instead of preaching or philosophizing. In theory, the visible world is to him a Circe which, if he yielded to it, would make him a bad artist; but, in practice, he is a good one when he yields to it. This is not as it should be according to his view of the universe; but it is so; and, like Margaret Fuller, he ought now to cry: "I accept the universe." No doubt all his asceticism in the past has been of use to him; he is in no danger of greedily gulping down whatever the visible world offers him; he looks now with disciplined and fastidious senses. But this exhibition proves that, for him, to look with the eye confounds the wisdom of the mind. Take, for instance, that portrait of N. H.; it is just a portrait, the expression of an interest, not in significant form, but in that particular person. And, for that reason, the form there is much more significant than in works like the "Ravine" (32), where there is a deliberate effort to make the form significant, and where all the allurements of the visible world seem to be coldly reproved. It is amusing that in the portrait of N. H. there is one prose... of the aesthetic puritan: significant form makes its last stand in the cushion, which is a bit of dead design while all the rest is alive and looks undesigned. It is as if Joseph suddenly explained that he was purely platonic: and yet the living child is born. But forget all about Mr. Fry’s history, his conversion and his theories, and you must, I think, confess that this is a remarkable picture, not of any new kind, but just a portrait, full of insight expressed always in pictorial terms. And as it is with people, so it is with landscape. Mr. Fry needs to be bowed over, like Van Gogh, by the thing itself; he needs to find in it what he is looking for; and then he can paint it simply and directly and with great precision. This he has done in the "Port, Martigues," in the "White Road," in the "Farmyard," where he seems again to have looked on the beauty of the earth with cold reproving eyes, and to have said: "No; I will not be carried away by these obvious charms. I will make a picture of you: I will subject you to my own notions of significant form." The result is academic, not in the Royal Academy sense, but in the manner of the made landscapes of the seventeenth century. Mr. Fry does not say, "Where shall I put my brown tree?" but he does say, "How shall I achieve my significant form?" He does seem to be insisting, "This is how a landscape ought to be painted." But in art there are no oughts of this kind.

The exhibition contains many experiments, all of them interesting to the aesthetic philosopher, but some merely interesting to the public. Mr. Fry is still a student, though a very learned and clever one. In the "Viaduct" (37) he has been studying M. Marchand; in 8, 25, 43, he attempts genre in the modern manner, but it isn’t exactly his manner. We have seen these pictures before; we can classify them, and write them off. But we cannot classify the portrait of "Mlle. L." It is, we are sure, the woman herself; it is not an exercise in the modern manner upon a modern young person.

Perhaps Mr. Fry would disagree with this view of his art. That, to me, is a proof only that he has not quite found himself; but I am sure that the self exists to be found. I wish that some work by a fashionable "brilliant" painter could be hung among his pictures. Then one would see that the fashionable painter was merely vacuously splashing about, pretending that accident was design, and making a design of accident. Mr. Fry does always paint; that is to say, with each stroke of paint he defines, as a good writer defines with every word. At his worst, he would look honestly academic among a lot of fashionable pictures, and they would look trashy. At his best, he is an artist who can express his own interests, his own values, in the terms of his art. But I wish he would free himself of his inhibitions and austerities, yield himself up to nature, and forget all about Joseph and Potiphar’s wife and significant form.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

P. & D. COLNAGHI & Co.—Etchings and Lithographs by Jean Louis Forain.

It is a pleasure to signal the renaissance of the New English Art Club. In the normal course an institution of this kind would now be quiescent and moribund. And there was indeed a pre-Raphaelism of the Club appeared about as yet its normal fate. Handicapped by prejudices in favour of Neo-Pre-Raphaelism and deserted by most of its successful members, it seemed about to degenerate into a home for the minor lights of twenty years ago and a happy hunting-ground for young ladies from the Slade School. But the present exhibition shows that our league has not yet lost its lustre. A.E.C. has taken the bull by the horns and thrown open its doors to members of the London Group and of Group X, and other young men in touch with contemporary effort and research.

The advantages of the step are obvious if we compare Miss Etzel Walker’s large decoration, which is merely large and decorative, with Mr. Alvaro Guevara’s panel "Medusa’s Trial," which is decorative and a good deal more besides. The nominal theme of Mr. Guevara’s picture is a scene in a court of law. But the real theme—the relation of imminent tangible entities to things comparatively remote—might have occurred to Mr. Guevara in a hundred other places. The picture has in fact no literary significance at all. It is purely aesthetic in intent and result. It might equally well be said to represent a scene at a circus or in a church, or in any other locality where our attention, projected to a certain distance, has to fight with the above, around and between a series of intervening obstructions. Guevara has tried to express this sensation in pictorial terms. But he has not quite solved the problem of the plastic relations between the high-relief silhouettes in the foreground and the smaller and flatter forms behind. Still, we should be dogmatic indeed if we refused gratitude to him for the beauty of these heads or failed to recognize "Medusa’s Trial" as a most interesting experiment.

Mr. H. S. Williamson’s "Strike Meeting" is another attempt to translate emotional experience into pictorial terms. It is thinly and poorly painted—a mere drawing in oil-colour—but the scene is excellently realized, and the picture devised for emotional expression admirably constructed and placed in a plane. The same artist’s "House at Hampstead" is also a very sensitive and intelligent work. Mr. Williamson might learn something of the nature of oil-paint as a medium from the exhibits of Mr. Gimner and Mr. Paul Nash. In the hands of the former it has the heavy, plant solidity of clay; in the hands of the latter it takes on a crystalline quality, ranging from a warm lusciousness to an almost metallic cold. Mr. Nash is, indeed, a born painter who has the wisdom to reinforce his instincts by the discipline of continuous drawing. There is good painting also in Mr. Gertler’s still life, Mr. Neville Lewis’s portrait of a famous dealer, Mr. Wallis’s "Edith Green," and in the "C. J. Holmes, who (with Mr. Muirhead Bone) upholds the honour of the generation which made the New English Art Club famous.

That conditions are, or were, different in Paris is evident from the exhibition of etchings by Forain at Messrs. Colnaghi’s Gallery. Forain, who is one of the most famous and popular commercial artists in France, could not possibly have made a living as a commercial draughtsman in England. For he looks facts in the face and blurs out the truth again and again in cruellusive drawings. His scathing comments on social and political corruption were accepted and welcomed by the people of the Third Republic because they were part of a general revolutionary action against evasions and a general revolutionary eagerness to drag ugly facts into the daylight. But Forain could not have drawn for forty years in the English illustrated press and remained an eminent artist at the end. But he has done it in France. In December, 1918, at the age of fifty-six, after a long journalistic career, he suddenly took up his etching needles, in which he had practically abandoned since his youth, and produced, within two years, a series of ninety-four etchings of such technical excellence that Mr. Campbell Dodgson does not hesitate to describe him as "one of the great etchers of the world." And this high praise is probably not exaggerated. All etchers will certainly add that Forain’s line in these plates is miraculously free and accurate and instinct with life. Many of the etchings are leaves, as it were, from the note-book of a great impressionist, of a realist who has an unusual power of mastering the universal significance of a fragment. But Forain does not restrict himself to such notes. He enters the field of imaginative realism with a series of illustrations to the Gospel story, and challenges comparison with the later work of Rembrandt. The young men of to-day, who excel in qualities which Forain lacks and centre their attention on purely aesthetic problems, with which he has no conscious concern, would be well advised to study these etchings. But for the direction of the tradition of human life which is, and always has been, one of the main roots of Western Art, and the work of an artist of fine sensibility, with personal visions and great moral courage.

COVENT GARDEN: "PULCINELLA"

AFTER the tedious monotony of the opera season at Covent Garden, and the still more tedious monotony of the ballet season at Drury Lane, it was a welcome relief to see the Diaghilev ballet once more. There was a large and even inelastic audience, at any rate in the upper part of the house, last Thursday week; a tremendous burst of applause for M. Ansermet when that familiar silhouette appeared in the orchestra, and so many bouquets presented to the dancers that one might almost have imagined oneself to be next door. The evening began with one of the ballets from the former repertory, "Children's Tales," or, as we are now to call it, "Contes Russes."; at Covent Garden evening dress is indispensible. It gained immensely by the help of the fine orchestra and the big stage; there was no doubt that all the company were determined to be at their best.

The new ballet "Pulcinella" bears the names of Pergolesi and Stravinsky as composers, with Picasso as decorat or, but the one mind which it represents more than any other is the astut mind of M. Diaghilev. Long ago an Italian musician of the name of Tommasini conceived the idea of translating a play of Goldoni into the language of ballet and setting it to the music of Domenico Scarlatti. Scarlatti was very much to the fore at that moment, for another Italian musician, Alessandro Longo, had just completed the publication of his complete works for the harpsichord, amounting to over five hundred pieces. Signor Tommasini picked the best of them, together with a few old favourites, and scored them for a modern orchestra with a remarkably sympathetic ingenuity. M. Diaghilev produced the ballet. It had a huge success in Rome, where everybody knew the name, if not indeed the works, of Goldoni and Scarlatti. He brought it to London, but found that it took some time before a Coliseum audience entered into the spirit of it. He moved from the Coliseum to the Alhambra and the Empire, and there discovered what his real London audience was to be. The Coliseum audience frankly prefers old friends to new acquaintances. The Diaghilev audience (I must call it by its name, for it is his creation) consisted of, or was at any rate dominated by, the "intellectual-smart"—musician; who know all about painting, painters who know all about music, poets who like to be men about town, men about town who like to be poets, up-to-date scholars, antiquarian modernists—all those in fact who, whatever class they may belong to, like to flatter themselves that they at any rate stand outside it. They may not understand themselves, but M. Diaghilev understands them as if he were himself the maestro whose immortal hand had framed their sawdust and tinsel ananomies.

Ordinary people like you and me might have thought the Scarlatti ballet a great success. Really it was rather a failure. It was too classical for the Coliseum, and too classical for the other audience as well. The former did not want to discuss it, the latter could not, for it was so perfect as to be indiscreet. What is the use of a work of art if you cannot discuss it from the point of view of a true Diaghilevite? Supposing it had been a success at the Coliseum—an ordinary manager might have thought that the best thing to do would be to follow it up with a different entertainment that should resemble it as closely as possible. Of some fifty plays of Goldoni and five hundred and fifty pieces of Scarlatti Signo, Tommasini might easily have produced another "Good-Humoured Ladies." But that would have been a very commonplace affair, for Goldoni and Scarlatti are in print and can be read by anybody. So with his unfailing flair for the successful thing M. Diaghilev pitched upon Pergolesi, Pergolesi to the world at large stands for Italy of the eighteenth century, just as Paderewski stands for Poland of to-day. That was why they made him President of the new republic, for he wrote the Quo Vadis? ("being dead") whom the world at large had ever heard of. Pergolesi had a romantic history. It happens to be quite untrue, but then that makes it all the more romantic. His music is practically unknown, and hardly ever performed, but his name is yet ever more. Naples, with unconscious irony, has given his name to a street which has no doors in it. His memory is kept green by one song, "Se tu m'amai," which is about a much like Pergolesi as "Pietà, Signore." is like Stradella. To complete the disguise, it has been edited by Signor Parisotti. Accordingly, "Se tu m'amai" makes the central point of the new ballet.

Pergolesi's own music (he really did compose some) is quite agreeable to sing, but is totally devoid of any qualities that might suggest dancing. But there—Schubert could set a menu to music; M. Massine can design steps to Pergolesi. Besides, there are singers behind the scenes who at intervals sing airs from his comic operas, and, of course, "Se tu m'amai." How they come to be associated with the story of Pulcinella is not explained; but they sound quite agreeable, which is the main thing. But the dance music presented a difficult problem. It was easy enough to dress up Scarlatti; Scarlatti's music dances by itself. Pergolesi required more ingenuity than that of a mere Tommasini or Respighi. Besides, they too were Italians and scholarly musicians too. They might even have a respect for the style of these old Italian composers. It was a happy thought to entrust the score to M. Stravinsky. There could be no fear of his keeping himself in the background, o of his allowing the old composer to become too tedious. But, alas! Parossittted or Stravinskified, Pergolesi's sentimental helplessness remains for ever a dead weight upon the ballet. Vainly does M. Stravinsky endeavour to enliven him, by making his music sound as if the members of the orchestra had lost their places or were playing their parts upside down. No false bougnoise could be more flabbily inert. So he gives up the task in despair, as well he might, and wriggles off at every opportunity into pure Stravinsky to which one could listen with pleasure, if only there was enough of it. The whole saves Pergolesi from the attempt to criticise his decorations would be an impertinence; I have not yet been forgiven for daring—a mere scribbler on music—to admire his scenery for "The Three-Cornered Hat." But he elucidates "Pulcinella." He demonstrates clearly that up to this moment I have been listening to the ballet through the wrong end of my ear-trumpet. Observe the quintessence of Diaghilevism—"Pulcinella" is not a follower of the "Good-Humoured Ladies," but is merely engaged upon a more elaborate "Parade." Some pedantic historical researcher of the future may endeavour to explain it on the theory that like "The Magic Flute" (Mozart's, not Drigo's) it was conceived as one thing and brought to birth as something quite different. Were contemporary observers know better. Mozart was obviously the Stravinsky of his day; M. Diaghilev elucidates at last that mysterious personality Schikaneder.

Start your imagination in Paradeschritt and you will understand "Pulcinella." Did you imagine that Erik Satie was a unique natural phenomenon? When Nature had exhausted herself in the production of two poets, to make a third, s' enjoin the former two. M. Diaghilev proceed on more scientific lines, as befits the modern age. Nature produced Satie. The maestro, by coupling his eccentricity with the stupidity of Pergolesi, has created synthetic Satie.

Edward J. Dent
The famous Flonzaley Quartet have survived the war, and gave a single concert in London on June 4, which made one wish that they could have remained longer in this series. They represent the perfection of quartet-playing, a perfection so severe that there are few quartets good enough for them to play. Mozart alone came through their trial unscathed. They make no concessions to weaker composers. Smetana's "Aus meinem Leben" has all the failings of a too romantic writing, and they were mercilessly shown up by the rigorous charity which is the characteristic of the Flonzaley players. They exposed the same weakness, less often but in a more acute degree, in a new quartet by C. M. Loefler, the first two movements of which promised a higher intellectual standard than the third movement, with its deplorable--at best a mere trick--"pizzicato" by Wolfgang. But Mozart the quartet was at its best. Clearness and perfection of finish are always essential for the interpretation of Mozart, but it is seldom that a quartet manages to attain the needful delicacy and precision without becoming anemic and emasculated. The Flonzaley Quartet put Mozart, as it were, under a powerful microscope. The relations of his values remained unchanged, but the whole organism was exhibited on an abnormally large scale by virtue of the marvellously beautiful and powerful tone which they produce from their instruments, heightened by the added sonority which comes from the absolute perfection of ensemble and intonation.

In her pianoforte recital at the Wigmore Hall on June 10, Miss Violet Clarencet introduced some new pieces by Mr. & Becket Williams. There was nothing in these to suggest that Mr. & Becket Williams is likely to develop into a good composer. Nor, from the executive standpoint, did this recital ever rise above mediocrity.

Mr. Gerald Cooper, who gave a vocal recital at the Eolian Hall on June 11, is a musician of judgment, but unfortunately he is no singer. He lacks both quality and power of tone, he cannot hold his notes, his diction is indistinct. All the good intentions in the world will not compensate for a complete lack of technical equipment. Mr. Lionel Tertis made a welcome reappearance at this concert, and was joined by Mr. R. H. Wathew in a first performance of the latter's new "Serenade Souvait" for piano and viola. The work lacks thematic vitality, but its clarity of style, economy of notes, and general mastery of its medium entitle it to every respect.

Miss Marcia Van Dresser, who was heard the same afternoon at the Wigmore Hall, is a more proficient performer than many we have heard these last few weeks. She has a voice, is under control, and sings from her heart. Her interpretations suffer, none the less, from a want of rhythmic power and flexibility, whilst her sense of musical values is, to say the least of it, erratic. Spohr's "Rose Softly Blooming" can usually be relied on to mark the nadir point of any programme in which it appears. It was, however, the best song in Miss Van Dresser's final group.

The Newport Choir appeared at Queen's Hall on June 11, when their programme included, amongst other things, the first orchestral performance in London of Vaughan Williams' "Mystical Songs," with Mr. Percy Hening as soloist. To say that the performance was a poor compliment to the composer and the London public is to put it mildly. Mr. Hening's treatment of the solo melody was rigid and lifeless, the orchestral playing suggested in many places being read at sight, whilst the conducting was left to the local chorus-master, whose convulsive jerks appeared to indicate extreme nervous tension coupled with complete inexperience of orchestral management. What the rest of the concert was like we cannot say; we did not stop to hear it.

The British Drama League will hold an annual celebration on June 25-26. A public meeting will be held at the Haymarket Theatre at 3 p.m. on the first day; and a corporate visit to "The Skin Game" at the St. Martin's Theatre will be paid in the evening. The annual business meeting of the League will be held at the Inns of Court Mission, 44, Drury Lane, on June 26 at 10.30 a.m.

"La Légende de Saint-Christophe," opera in three acts and eight "tableaux, poem and music by M. Vincent d'Indy, was performed on June 10. One had supposed on which the composer had been engaged for twenty years, was finished during the war, but has had to wait until now for its first performance. At the "rétification générale." "La Légende de St. Christopher" lasted from shortly after seven o'clock until nearly midnight—and this despite the fact that it was considerably "coupé." One had supposed that these gigantic entertainments were a peculiarity of ancient Greece, modern Germany and Japan; but who knows if we may not soon be called upon to bring our mattresses to the theatre, and settle down to day-and-night performances with short intervals for sleep? We hope M. d'Indy's opera will not encourage these potential dramatists whose brains are teeming with ininterminable tragedies; brevity is rather the fashion of the day, and, being a wholesome fashion with much to recommend it, we hope it may endure.

We hasten to add, however, that M. d'Indy's opera, apart from its duration, is not a work to be dismissed in so many words. In the first place it is obviously sincere in every note, and bears ample evidence from beginning to end of the nobility of its composer's intention. The writing is entirely free from vulgarity, and there are passages which border on real beauty; but a certain aridity of style only serves to heighten the monotony which inevitably attaches to the lengthy exposition of an allegory of "morality," play, to which category the "Legend of St. Christopher" really belongs. It is the story of the giant Auferus who has sworn to serve the most powerful King on earth. The Queen of Pleasure, his first mistress, is supplanted by the King of Gold, who buys up her Babylonian palace with all its inmates in the twinkling of an eye. Auferus then enters the service of this King, who is in turn supplanted by the King of Evil. While serving the King of Evil Auferus learns of the existence of a still mightier power, the King of Heaven, whose emblem, the shadow of a cross, reduces the bragging King of Evil to abject impotence. Auferus then seeks service for the King of Heaven for seven years without success, and finally meets a Hermit who condemns him to ferry travellers across a fursious mountain torrent. Then comes the well-known incident of the revelation of the King of Heaven in the person of a little child who is carried on the giant's shoulders and baptizes him "Christopher" in the middle of the stream. The last scene deals with the conversion of the Queen of Pleasure, who reappears as the courteous Nicae, and the martyr of St. Christopher.

The scenery has been specially painted by M. Maurice Denis, and while certain sets are happily conceived, there are others which do not escape banality. M. d'Indy was the author of a speech which occasioned some laughter at an interlude in the second act, the whole audience tuning towards the central "logo" which he was occupying and obliging him to bow acknowledgment. The general impression left by the work could not be more happily summed up than in the words of a certain Parisian critic who describes it as "un automate de spectacle de science musicale française"—with a slight accent, more implied than expressed, on the word "science." But then M. d'Indy is not head of the "Schola Cantorum" for nothing, and it is well known that the old building in the Rue St. Jacques is the last remaining stronghold of the contrapuntalists.

At the last concert of the S.M.I. de Falla played his "Nuits dans les Jardins de l'Espagne," a delightfully limpid composition; and Darius Milhaud's "Les Soirs de Petrograd" were given for the first time, not without creating a slight hubbub in the hall.

A second hearing (with orchestra) of Erik Satie's 'Socrate' (to which we have referred already in this column) confirms and strengthens our admiration for this intensely, but modestly original musical realization of the soul of Plato. It is to be hoped that the author's reputation as a "blagueur" will not prevent this, at all events, from being taken seriously.

LAST THOUGHTS ON THE GUITRY SEASON

"Tu as le bon de plaisance," says the poet to his "night-ingle" in "Jean de la Fontaine," and if there was a looking-glass in the room when M. Sacha Guitry wrote that line he must surely have taken a glance at it. For he has above all things that precious and dangerous "gift of pleasing"—precious because it gives him the right to dare every experiment, dangerous because it tempts him to take every licence. Secure in this gift, he plays with the theatre as with a toy. He writes plays without plots; puts his actors among the audience; then banishes women from the cast, now brings in more women than any one hero has any right to be concerned with; begins his pieces with strange surprises, and sometimes gives them no ending; mixes ancient and modern, and in general pleases everyone by pleasing simply himself. It is only sour critics who murmur that he sometimes chases the butterflies of his fancy too long and too far, and are sometimes amused by jokes of a second-rate quality, sometimes shows a taste for collecting a group of old jests and tricks as though they were priceless bric-a-brac. It is only jaundiced critics who have the feeling that in all his pieces, whatever their scene or period, there is but one character really, and that character himself. He is in the first place M. Guitry is worth a odious personae dramatis. and in the second place it is good for the stage to be shaken up, however irresponsibly, and in the third place he has really opened up new, fruitful paths. To take one example only, consider his "curtains." He prefers not to end on a climax, but in the heat of a situation. Some absurdity in persons or things is just revealing itself, when the swish of the curtain is heard like a chuckle of malice. The surprise of it drives home the moral with a clap; the absence of emphasis quadruples the irony.

M. Guitry then is a charmer—and a magician. He is a finer illusioniste than the one he has written about. He makes a little go such a long way. A little biography suffices for "Pasteur," a little history yields "Jean de la Fontaine," a dash of realism creates the music-hall scenes in "L'Illusioniste," and a spice of philosophy makes "Mon Père avait Raison." There is nothing solid in any of these works, but it takes talent, not trickery, to bring off the illusion. For that reason it is well that the season ended with the last named of these pieces, for there the talent is most obvious and undeniable. It may not be the most brilliantly written, but it is the best acted of all the series. It brings together M. Guitry the elder—in all the depth and reality of his genius, compared with which wizardry is such a slight accomplishment—Mlle. Printemps, with her limited but delicate perfection of style, and the author in his most conscientious vein. Telephone scenes may have been overdone, but there is nothing stale in that wonderful telephone monologue of his that ends the first Act. The drama and tenor of it are simply amazing. If M. Sacha Guitry has acting like this in reserve, we wish he would take himself seriously more often.

Two performances of "As You Like It" will be given by the Oxford University Dramatic Society on Saturday, June 19 (at 2.30 and 8.15), and afternoon performances will take place on June 21, 22, and 23. They will be held in the Wardens' garden at Wadham College. The production is to be supervised by Mr. Nigel Playfair on the lines of his recent rendering of "As You Like It" at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith. Arne's music will be used for the various songs.

CHARLIE YONG

Lyric Theatre.—"East is West." A Comedy in 3 Acts and a Prologue. By Samuel Shipman and John B. Hymer.

One ought, perhaps, to have lived in San Francisco to understand "East is West," thoroughly, but even to a spectator without any intimate knowledge of the problem presented by the half-Americanized Chinaman—fifty-fifty—as he calls himself—who provides the piece with its villain. Much more terrible than Mr. Wu is this chip-shot of a stage caricature of a student who both inane and grotesquely beneath his top hat, his absurd duds clothes in which he can hardly walk, his cigarette case which he handles as though it might bite him—all the fatuity, in short, of the half-assimilated barbarian, superposed on the stiffness, the cunning and the ineradicable dignity of the Oriental. There is a whole volume of sociology—and a highly disquieting one it must be to the citizens of this great "Melting Pot"—in the figure of Yon: adapting, without too much difficulty, to Western commercial civilization his inbred instincts of the slave-drove and the harem. To see the lightning change by which Charlie's face smiles of satisfaction at his exquisite bon ton gives place to the grim mask of his character is to read the whole moral of mixing civilizations. Mr. Nash is an actor of great imagination, and he has given us something quite new to ponder over.

A MAETERLINCK PLAY

The success, or rather the triumph, of M. Comisarjovsky in his production of Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice" was not so much positive as incidental. The extreme subtlety and atmospheric aloofness of such a work would be difficult enough to convey at the best of times; but the performance was given in the Eolian Hall, a room which, adapted to stage purposes, becomes precisely what needs to be avoided for even the most conventional of Maeterlinck's theatre. The miracle of the Virgin stepping down from her altar and becoming the prototype of the runaway Sister Beatrice is comparatively insignificant against that of an interpretation in which is retained, despite the conditions, the essential quality of Maeterlinck's elusive art.

The feeling which one's reading of his earlier plays evokes is that if they are to be staged at all the audience must only see them acted across a vague distance, as though we were the watchers outside the window of "The Interior." The spoken word must come to us almost as a sigh, the most vital figures must remain shadowy, every movement a mere suggestion. M. Comisarjovsky's setting was unavoidably definite as realism itself, the players actually walked among us, and there was no doubt at all about the innocence.

But, in spite of everything, the performance was beautiful, true, and moving. The producer was assisted in good measure by the acting of Miss Dorothy Massingham as Sister Beatrice, Miss Mary Grey as the Abbess, Miss Mary Gilchrist as the Princess, and Mr. Brember Wills as the Priest. The scene between the prince and the nun, heart-torn by conflicting emotions, was especially convincing, although at a later point the tragic intensity of the woman's complete and overwhelming disillusionment was not so adequately conveyed. The high standard of the ensemble work was evidenced in the mounting terror among the nuns. Every aspect of the production gained our admiration, and we hope that further presentations may be given under conditions less unfavourable.

THE COST OF BOOKS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Referring to the note in the "Literary Gossip" of your last issue, as a printer I appreciate the remarks of the writer as to the printer being the lesser sinner in the whole cost of producing books at the present time. Mr. John Murray has been recently interviewed on this subject, and I fully endorse his experience on this important matter. At the annual meeting of the Authors' Society, a few weeks ago, I endeavoured to make this clear to my fellow-members. Of the three elements that contribute to the making of the complete book, binding charges are proportionately higher than those made for printing, but those made by the paper-maker constitute him an easy first.

Just now further negotiations are pending as to another increase of wages in the printing trade, and the employers, whilst desiring to be sympathetic, have no alternative but to take the last official figures of the Board of Trade as a basis in order to find the present cost of living and other charges, as compared with those of pre-war days; this is still under consideration.

Having regard to the several advances made in both wages and materials since 1914, it is indeed a marvel to myself that publishers can issue books at the prices they do.

If I may freely paraphrase the old proverb, I venture to predict that "of the making of books there is an end " unless the prevailing conditions alter very much. Let our rulers see to this.

Chas. T. Jacob.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It is because we are sure that the publishing trade will be grateful to you for your suggestion made in the "Literary Gossip" column of June 11 that books should be published in paper covers, that we venture to draw your attention to a slight inaccuracy in the paragraph dealing with the subject. You say: "At present librarians, booksellers and publishers are of opinion that the public will not buy unbound books." This, so far as our firm is concerned, is not quite the case. We have no doubt that the public, had they reasonable opportunity, would accept the paper-bound volume as readily as that bound in cloth. The opposition arises in the first place from the booksellers, who maintain that paper-bound books spoil the appearance of the shelves and consequently increase the proportion of damaged stock; and in the second place from the Circulating Libraries, who argue that paper wrappers would not stand handling by a number of subscribers and that consequently they would themselves be compelled in self-defence to bind the books. The booksellers' objection may or may not be valid, but it appears that the trade in other countries does not find paper wrappers an obstacle to profitable business. The argument of the Circulating Libraries is under present conditions unanswerable, but surely it is not out of the question for them to treat English wrapped books as at present they treat French books—that is to say, circulate them in their original paper until binding becomes essential, and then case the torn volumes.

It would be interesting and valuable to hear the opinion of Circulating Library authorities on the whole matter, for it is to the interest of the book trade as well as to that of the public that some means should be found of checking the continual rise in book prices.

ARTISTS AND MEN OF GENIUS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—May I direct your attention to a striking contradiction in the views expressed by two of your contributors in the last number of The Athenæum? On the one hand, in your leading article the writer protests against the criticism that "Dickens was not an artist"; on the other hand, the writer of the review entitled "The Old Comedy" declares that "England has produced a prodigious number of men of genius and comparatively few works of art." It appears to me that these sentences, if not themselves diametrically opposed, are yet impliedly so, and that is what I can hear (in fancy) the writer of the former article saying to the writer of the latter: "Either your works of art; give me the men of genius." To discuss these implications at all exhaustively would be impossible in a letter; I will be as brief as I can. Apparently T. S. E. considers a work of art that into which the artist "decants himself drop by drop," in Remy de Gourmont's phrase. I take it that this may be paraphrased as "a complete and precise expression of personality." I am not quite clear concerning M.'s conception. He appears to lay great stress on creative power, and I should deduce that if he accepted T. S. E.'s definition, he would make very great reservations concerning the nature of the personality expressed.

I do not wish to oppress M.'s phrases with a greater load of implication than they will bear; but I think that the underlying opposition could be fairly stated in these terms. T. S. E. is indifferent as to what is expressed, provided the expression be complete and precise, whereas M. hints that the point to which criticism should apply itself is the nature of that which is expressed.

For my own part, I am only too anxious to learn. I love to hear great argument on these matters; and I cherish a hope that one day I shall go out by a different door from that by which I went in. I am far from suggesting that it would be a good thing if the critical approach of your various contributors were to be made uniform. But there may be others than myself who look to The Athenæum for what I can only call a new critical discipline, of which they are vouchsafed only glimpses and snatches; and who share my feeling that the views of T. S. E. and M. in particular, may be capable of reconciliation—that T. S. E. implies more than he actually means, and that M. is not yet quite clear about the nature of the art which he instinctively rejects.

To put it in a nutshell. I feel that T. S. E. deprecates the fact that Dickens was not an artist, but (perhaps) a man of genius, while M. thanks God for it. M.'s method of thanking God is curious. He goes on to declare that "Dickens was, precisely, one of the greatest artists England or the world has ever produced." In other words, for M. an artist is a man who is not an artist according to T. S. E. "What would they say to each other or to us about Shakespeare?" T. S. E. claims him as "a deceiver of personality"; whereas M., I feel sure, would regard him as a super-Dickens. Am I wrong?

Yours faithfully,

William H. Polack.

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Mr. Dent in his criticism of "The Beggar's Opera" in The Athenæum of last week attributes to me a subtile of humour that I must hasten to disclaim. He remarks that "Mr. Fraser's scenery and costumes are an amusing skit on those of Mr. Norman Wilkinson and Mr. Hugo Rumbold." Now, the artist in the theatre is too rare a bird to stand much shooting, and I respect the work of the men
Foreign Literature
THEODOR FONTANE

THEODOR FONTANE: A CRITICAL STUDY. By Kenneth Hayens. (Collins. 7s. 6d. net.)

The centenary of the birth of Theodor Fontane, which was celebrated last year in Germany with much enthusiasm, might have seemed a favourable opportunity for the production of an account in English of the novelist's life and works. Such a volume, in fact, would have been deserving of a hearty welcome. It is not only that Fontane paid repeated visits to England, lived for certain portions of his life in London and in Scotland, and imitated our ballad-literature, and, finally, criticized our institutions and manners with insight, if not always with kindness—we recall that extracts from certain of his chapters on England were reprinted and issued as anti-British propaganda during the war. There are weightier reasons than these. Fontane is a writer who is thoroughly worth reading and understanding for his own sake: in certain respects he is the key to modern German fiction.

In treating such a writer, eminent, important, yet not familiar to the average British cultivated reader, it is essential that the critic should form a clear idea of the method he proposes to pursue. He may be popular in the best sense, expanding the writer's works in their order, stimulating a desire to read them by a description of their contents, the circumstances of their composition, the chief features of their style and the influences brought to bear on it. The alternative, more scientific, is to provide a critical apparatus for the detailed examination of each work—not so much as an individual work of art as material for systematic critical study. This latter method would be useful to the student of literature; it might also attract the general reader. At all events, it is quite a possible method of treating a foreign author for the enlightenment of the educated British public.

Mr. Kenneth Hayens, in this critical study, appears to have fallen between the two. He classifies Fontane's work, it is true, and no serious exception can be taken to his plan:

The Historical Novelist: "Vor dem Sturm"; "Schach von Wathenow;" "The Story-Teller: "Gröte Mine"; "Ellenkipp;" "Unterm Bierbraum;" "The New World: "Quitt;" "Berlin Photocopy: "L'Adultera;" "Frau Jenny Trebel;" "Unequal Marriages: "Unehelicherbräutig;" "Elm Breest;" "Sentiment and Society: "Irrungen, Wirrungen;" "Stine;" "Poor Nobility: "Die Poggenpohl;" "A Liberal Conservative: "Der Stechlin;" "There is also given—as would be given by our "popular" critic—an outline of the plot of each novel. To these outlines, also, no serious objection can be raised—although they are, like the rest of the book, often confused and written in a curiously un-English, ungrammatical and irritating style. Leaving these aside, however, we find an appeal to the heavy critical method so much indulged in by Continental critics of a certain school. One would expect, to take only one example, that the symbolic introduction of Tintoretto's picture into the novel "L'Adultera" would have been mentioned earlier and interpreted. One must presume that Mr. Hayens knows his subject too well and in far too great detail to be a sympathetic intermediary between Fontane and the reader. He is the botanist with the magnifying-glass when one really requires the man of imagination. He has drawn up a formula for novel-writing into which, one after another, he attempts to fit Fontane's works—until we are heartily tired of hearing that the "speech" is excellent, or in correct proportion to the action; that there is little "extraneous" matter, and that even in a certain novel "servants are negligible, and children wanting"; or that there is a plentiful (or the reverse) use of the rhetorical question, or of asterisks to mark divisions between chapters, to the man who wished to appreciate Fontane's great gifts as a historical novelist and the way in which he, an artist of genuine originality, acclimatized French realism in German literature. The man who cares for the essential points of critical appreciation would not bother his head much, if at all, with the question whether chapter-headings were present or absent, or what was the proportion of foreign to native words. It would be easy to raise a laugh by quoting examples of Mr. Hayens's minute care for details to the neglect of the broader aspect of Fontane's genius.

Mr. Hayens, in fact, with—we will gladly recognize—much literary piety and the best intentions in the world, has made of Fontane a thoroughly dull writer. An insufficient command of English and a dry-as-dust critical method have combined to obscure the shining talent of one of Germany's modern masters of prose-fiction. Mr. Hayens's aim is so good that we heartily wish his achievement had been better.

In the short bibliographical preface, by the way, room might have been found for J. Dresch's "Roman social en Allemagne : 1850-1900."

DISSIPATED NOBILITY
Alceste. Par André Gyal. (Paris, Olendorff. 5fr.)
A company of aesthetes headed by a individualist philosopher is rudely disturbed from platonic discourses on a remote island by the news that the European war has been unchained and has claimed Jaurès for its first victim. One by one the disputants are dragged into the maelstrom. The philosopher (presumably unfit or over military age) is left alone to soliloquize on the cultivation of the ego, the uselessness of applied science and the advantages of detached contemplation. In the end a spirit message from a departed disciple breaks in upon his calm, cures him of individualism, and drives him back into the world with a not very precisely defined educational mission.

Such, if we read it rightly, is the main content of M. André Gyal's book, which, though tedious, diffuse, pretentious, and in some places absurd, is the fruit of a spirit of indignant revolt characteristic of the youth of our day. As a contribution to thought "Alceste" is negligible, but the impulse behind it is streaked with nobility. If only the reaction from the war, the widespread and genuine bitterness could be organized for effect—could be recruited, for example, into an army of stalwarts determined to make the League of Nations a living force in international politics—we might find ourselves a step further on the painful path of progress, and be spared, incidentally, such pathetic outbursts as "Alceste," where youthful enthusiasm is dissipated in chaotic protest.

VERLAINE COMMEMORATION DAY IN PARIS
On Sunday morning, May 30, a meeting of the Verlaine Society was held in the Luxembourg Gardens in front of the poet's statue. This interesting little ceremony, the observance of which had been interrupted by the war, is once more to become an annual fixture, and will take place each year on the last Sunday in May.

Standing on the grass, under the green trees and against a background of trailing roses and tall foxgloves, which surround the statue, the actress from the Odéon and elsewhere recited some selections from the poet's works, which were attentively listened to by the quiet audience informally assembled. This form of homage to the memory of a great poet, at once simple and sincere, is more eloquent than any sculptured monument, and no tribute to literature could be more graciously paid.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE SOUTH
Questione Meridionale e Riforma Tributaria. By Giustino Fortunato. (Rome, La Voce. 5 lire.)
Le Prime Lettere Meridionali. By Pasquale Villari. (Rome, La Voce. 3 lire.)

The South has had to wait long even for a recognition of its grievances, but thanks to the efforts of a number of loyal and able Southerners, Signor Nitti and Signor Salvemini, the editor of L'Unità, among them, it looks as if the time for actual relief were fast approaching. For many years it was believed that the South was a rich country, more prosperous and fertile than the North. But upon this dream, as upon not a few others in recent years, geography with its attendant mishaps keeps on breaking in; and Signor Fortunato's little book, based on an exhaustive study of the subject and equipped with a good up-to-date bibliography, helps to shatter it for ever. The difference in the "two Italies," which meet in the neighbourhood of Rome and the Tiber, is amply reflected in their history. The vigorous communal life of the North was its most prominent characteristic through all its vicissitudes, whereas the South has always been monarchical and feudal.

Nor could the South ever have been rich. The soil is poor as a whole. The civilization of Magna Graecia was a hetic, unnatural growth that was bound to wither early, and its decay is often ascribed to malaria, a scourge which still makes large tracts of the plains altogether uninhabitable, the peasants returning to the mountains at night. The mountains have long been stripped of their woods, but the reforestation of them would not greatly increase the wealth of the country, though it might improve its health conditions and do something towards turning the roaring torrents into regular streams. The rainfall is very irregular. In addition, there are the earthquakes and the volcanic eruptions. Communications are still bad, though they have been improved by motor services.

To unite such a country with the North was like putting an earthenware jug to travel with an iron pot, and Signor Fortunato will not even allow Signor Nitti's contention that the South was really more prosperous than the North in 1861, at the time of the union. The taxes were few, but they were heavy, and the amount of specie in the country was far more a mark of wealth. These letters of Pasquale Villari certainly help to make clear the difficulties of the transition period. The officials sent from the North had no knowledge of the people with whom they had to deal. They regarded them with suspicion, not unmixed with fear, while intrigues were endless. Considering the amazing ignorance of the South that prevailed, it is not surprising that mistakes were made. But at least these letters bear witness to the great material progress of recent years.

The taxation of the South since the union is now universally admitted to have been excessive. The only question in dispute is the exact amount that would be a fair contribution. In any case, it is only by slow degrees that the South will be able to recover the ground lost during the last half-century or so. One thing is certain, and that is that the continuance of the present heavy protective tariff in favour of the industrial North would be a grave injustice to these agricultural regions. Given the high rate of mortgages and the unfertility of the soil, combined with the small margin of profit, it will certainly be difficult to attract capital to the South. Signor Fortunato, who supports his contention with elaborate statistics, insists that there is not one of the four great taxes upon which Italy largely relies for her revenue that does not weigh disproportionately heavily on the southern provinces of the kingdom, among which he, of course, includes the islands.
III. A FEW BELATED REFLECTIONS ON THE COMMEMORATION OF SAINTE-BEUVE’S DEATH.

In Amiel’s Journal for October, 1889, one finds several entries on the death of Sainte-Beuve, which occurred on the 13th of that month. Better perhaps than any other statement, on account precisely of their informal character (though, when his faculty of judgment is precisely challenged, Amiel’s style in the Journal reaches the utmost nicety), Matthew Arnold rightly observed that Amiel’s true vocation was that of a literary critic; these entries preserve for us the enlightened contemporary feeling; even then there was a foreboding that the death of Sainte-Beuve marked the end of an era.

19 October, 1889. A bel article d’Edmond Schérer sur Sainte-Beuve dans le Figaro. Il est bien le prince des critiques franças—le dernier représentant de l’époque du goûte littéraire, l’avenir étant aux faiseurs et aux simples, à la médiocrité et à la violence. L’article respire une certaine mélancolie virile, qui sied dans la nécrologie d’un maître à choses de l’esprit.

Fifty years had elapsed last October since these lines were written, and the commemoration of the date went far to establish that by now Schérer’s prediction had indeed become a fact. If we except Paul Bourget, always to be read and pondered whenever he writes of one of his great elders; Daniel Hailévy, who has inherited something both of Sainte-Beuve’s idealism and of Sainte-Beuve’s occasional disinclination to hesitation; Albert Thibaudet, the indefatigable free-lance of contemporary criticism, to be met on every threatened position; and the one opponent to whom we shall revert presently, Marcel Proust—it was only too evident that nobody, and least of all the critics by profession, had the slightest idea what the name of Sainte-Beuve stood for, nor what the simple mention of it conveys to the truly literary mind.

The case is curious, but it is also, in a measure, pathetic. Here is a man who, more perhaps than any writer of equal importance, entertained a genuine regard for the general public, and who so contrives that his work, instead of being thereby disdained, acquires an enhanced value; who takes it as the highest calling of the critic to act the part of an honest and careful interpreter between the writer and the public, and vice versa; to this task he devotes the last twenty years of his splendid maturity, and the ultimate result of his effort seems to be that the most comprehensive and the most lucid body of European criticism in existence remains practically unread by the very persons for whom it was primarily intended. Sainte-Beuve, who should be the daily food of all aspirants to knowledge and culture, is neglected (or writers whom those aspirants are as yet unable to assimilate or even to understand, with the consequence that he has fallen to the lot of the few who might perhaps more easily dispense with him, for he is far too much respect for his memory to be ever tempted to do so.

And yet there is a point where Sainte-Beuve’s achievement presents a vulnerable front. The point lies near at hand, and could not escape the notice of any attentive reader, but it required a certain amount of delving to get at the core of the matter, and though no doubt some of us had privately formed their conclusions, they were only recently brought to light. It sometimes happens that when we take up one of the “Lundis” (especially, as is frequently pointed out, when Sainte-Beuve writes of a contemporary—but not only then) we understand a little better, we agree in detail with almost everything that Sainte-Beuve says, we respond to the delicate accuracy of each new stroke of the painter’s brush, but when the literary portrait—which always seems in the process of growing gradually before our eyes—is completed, in the very measure in which we endorse the judgment it conveys, we seem to become the more aware how much, even in such a judgment as this, which never seems to the salve which he effectuated at the right moment of an enormous amount of valuable French work which, but for his intervention, would have already sunk or would lie buried in inaccessible corners or in ponderous unreadable tracts, is after all a salve. For in every case of the men called “minors” who can be trusted to take care of themselves, but the “minors” always run great risks, and Sainte-Beuve—who professed for them the discriminating tenderness of a cultivated and equable mind, and who was always so obstinately taken to task on the subject by the latest stilled adept—has secured and carefully Argentina to each of the many works which provides them with just that measure of immortality to which they are entitled. It is far too imperfectly realized that we still visualize the greatest bulk of French literature—say until 1820—in the terms and with the values established by Sainte-Beuve more than fifty years ago: in his appreciation of individual men or genres we may find that he occasionally falls short, but in his delineation of all the immense that the French genius, of which to-day we hear so much and yet so little—as manifested in innumerable and delightful personalities—Sainte-Beuve stands absolutely alone.

two “Nouveaux Lundi” — will suffice to remind us of the price he had to pay for the result:

J’en vux un peu (je vous l’avoue bien bas), non pas an public, dont je n’ai en général qu’à me louser, mais à notre société telle quelle est, de ce qu’un homme qui travaille et qui imprime depuis quarante ans (c’est le chiffre exact), s’est voit condamné à continuer indéfiniment, sans que personne s’avise qu’il fait chaque semaine un tour de force, et que, tout en s’y amusant parfois lui-même tout le premier. Be court qu’une belle journée s’asserisse. Le physique est tout, même dans l’esprit, et mon physique chaque semaine est horriblement tendu. Je descends au fond d’un puits chaque mardi matin pour n’en ressortir que le vendredi soir, je ne sais trop à quelle heure.

List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. These first numerals in these represent the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on. Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, MAGAZINES, ETC.

Though this humble effort should be treated indulgently, we must confess to disappointment. Mr. Williams has a good deal to learn about book selection, and shows inability to distinguish a good guide-book to the choice of books from a bad one, or to judge between books themselves. Many of the guides he mentions are worthless: the superior guides are unmentioned. The British Museum has on the open shelves some four works containing bibliographies to philology: these are not included in Mr. William’s short list, which cites Nelson’s “Standard Books” and Sonnenschein’s “Best Books”—both of which should be under “General Guides”—and two other works of no authority.

H is literary taste may be gauged from his putting Grace Aguilar at the head of, and Henry Cockton among, the “classic” novelists, and William de Morgan, Miss E. O. Somerville, and George Moore in the third and lowest grade. He has misspelt Miss Somerville’s Christian name, and knighted Mr. Kipling.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

See notice, p. 812.

"The intellectual, emotional, and imaginative factors of persuasion work together," but the first is inferior in strength and effect to the second, as the author shows. He studies and distinguishes between the three and their subvarieties, illustrating his analysis with such modern instances as the art of camouflage, group pressure and suggestion, methods of exploitation in advertisement and elsewhere, gesture, the cinematograph, the novel and the drama. It is an excellent popular treatment of the whole subject. "That the non-rational is not necessarily the irrational" is one of many well-put truths in the book.

The war has given the opportunity, and the breakdown of old systems the justification, for Mr. Paine’s new aristocracy. The people must at once go back to the land. This is as easily done as he says, he thinks. The children of the old aristocracy must invite the whole working-class school population next summer to camp out with them in their parks and pleasure-grounds; and they must do it next year and so on. Mr. Paine’s economics are rather simple, and the industrial system is not to be so easily disposed of for a better and more primitive mode of life as he thinks; but his views on class prejudice and pretentiousness are healthy, if a little vague.

200 RELIGION.

Greek stories in an English dress. The legends are freely handled, and archaeological or topographical exactitude is not attempted by the author, whose treatment of the interesting themes he has chosen is adequate and satisfying.

Mr. Montree’s "Social Obligations of Industry to Labour" (a lecture given on November 12, 1918) has the first place in the volume. Other notable discourses are those delivered by Mr. T. H. Pear ("The Applications of Psychology to Industry"), Dr. T. M. Legge ("Occupational Diseases"), and Dr. A. F. Stanley Kent ("Industrial Fatigue"). All these lectures are by recognized authorities, and are weighty utterances on the subjects concerned.

One might call this the autobiography of the "W.E.A.,” the birth and growth of that vigorous society being identified over such a long period of years with Mr. Mansbridge. "Education and knowledge must not be confused,” he insists, and the work of the "W.E.A." has never confused them; rather, in the seminar method adopted by its tutorial classes, it has taught some wholesome lessons to all intelligent educators, and done as much as any movement to elevate the mental life of the people.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

The high cost of dairy produce and the reduced purchasing power of money have helped to develop goat-keeping in this country from a pastime or hobby into a practical business proposition. Mr. Davies’s book should be of very considerable service to persons who intend to labour in, and expend money upon, this promising field of activity.

A more rational arrangement of the housewife’s work; sensible planning of kitchens, so that muscular energy may not be wasted; and a widely-extended use of labour-saving devices, are becoming more and more urgently necessary in these nerve-racking times. Mrs. Frederick writes upon such topics clearly, and with expert knowledge. The methods and appliances described are for the most part American; the end in view is that home-keepers, their families, and the nation, should be developed to the 'fullest power and vantage ground in health, happiness and true prosperity.' We are sure that the book will be helpful.

*Bell (Edward). HELLENIC ARCHITECTURE: ITS GENESIS AND GROWTH ("The Origins of Architecture"). Bell, 1920. 8 in. 205 pp. map. ill. diag. ind., 7½ n. 722.8

Studying the most modern critical histories of architecture together with the latest results of research in the Egyptian area and elsewhere, Mr. Bell has shown the patronal relations of Minou and Mycenaean building, brought out the complex influences of Egypt, and rendered clear the main lines of architectural history in Greece.

Those who indulge in the hobby of collecting Baxter or Le Blond prints will find this a useful vade-mecum. It is a sort of epitome of the author's 'Picture Printer,' and at the same time a supplement thereto, the most valuable item being a catalogue of all known colour prints by Baxter, with prices and other particulars.

POETRY.

Pim (Herbert Moore). SONGS FROM AN ULSTER VALLEY. Grant Richards, 1920. 8 in. 96 pp. 3½ n. 821.9

There is a good deal of genuine poetry in Mr. Pim's volume, and some of the sonnets especially are evidence of a writer whose vision has the full advantage of technical competence. Could I redeem one moment with a rhyme

Or make this web of sense perpetuate,
Is a characteristic opening; and there is no example in the sonnet-section of the book that does not hold some equally dignified and musical passage. Had the sections headed "Poems" and "Miscellaneous Pieces" been as carefully ordered, there would have been little in Mr. Pim's work to detract from our just impression of poetic consistency and unerring judgment.

Powell (Charles). THE POETS IN THE NURSERY. With an introduction by John Drinkwater. Lane, 1920. 7½ in. 80 pp. 5½ n. 821.9

Imitations of the style of Stivnburne, Rossetti, the Browning, Kipling, Poe, Whitman, Fitzgerald's Omar, &c., rather than parodies of the satirical order.

FICTION.

Numerous details of the internal organization and management of a submarine are introduced into this narrative, which purports to be a record kept by a German naval lieutenant named Karl von Schenk. Karl describes some of his voyages, adventures, and narrow escapes during the war. He falls deeply in love with a Polish girl, who for the sake of her country has become a spy on the side of the Allies. She pays the penalty; and Karl, though acquitted of treachery to Germany, is superseded and virtually disgraced, shortly before the surrender of the German fleet. Mr. Frank H. Mason's illustrations enhance the interest of the book.

Probably there will always be different opinions in reference to the character of Edward Coleman, the secretary of the Duchess of York, who was executed at Tyburn for complicity in the alleged "Popish Plot," during the reign of the Merry Monarch. But it was only the tainted evidence of the ruffians Oates and Bedloe which accused Coleman of complicity in an assassination conspiracy: and the charitable view generally prevails that Coleman was a well-meaning and unfortunate zealot. The task which the author of this story set himself, of presenting a picture of Coleman's complex personality, was difficult; and upon the whole it has been accomplished satisfactorily. Miss Dinnis's portrayal of Coleman, who was only one among Oates's many victims, is, generally speaking, sympathetic. The novel is worth reading. It should appeal especially to Roman Catholics.

Jane Hobbs is the daughter of a retired butler. Her face is divine, and procures her matrimonial promotion to the rank of her father's employees. But her accent is that of Whitechapel, and the disgust with which this inspires her mother-in-law reacts unfavourably on Jane's relations with her own children. Determined to win her young people's respect by doing something useful, she enters the Army, and becomes a nurse, a cook, a tea-garden assistant, and a scrubber. Her book is an attempt to reproduce the life of a Cornish parish during the first decade of the nineteenth century. Some faults of construction are redeemed by much charm and sincerity. The slyly mystic, its hero, belongs to a type which is of every age; but with the blue-stockings lady of his adoration... and her hard-riding, hard-drinking husband and better disposed sons, Mr. MacDonald has, we think, been remarkably successful in catching the tone of certain social circles at that period. There are some vivid smuggling adventures and a terrible, but, we fear, exaggerated study of child labour at a time when conditions were even worse than those described by Disraeli in the forties. It is surely an anachronism to represent the family chaplain (and tutor) as deprived of all participation in tar or pudding.

The outward results of attempting to shield a young man from knowledge of the world's naughtinesses are deftly pictured in this bright story of a rich and youthful baronet, whose fond but silly mother has brought him up in such sheltered seclusion that when dining for the first time with a bachelor friend he is more valuable than discreet in his choice of table companions, and loses two thousand pounds at pool. He also rashly promises marriage to a chorus-girl, and finds himself in a jangle of difficulties. Mr. Marsh's books are usually highly readable, and the present story is no exception to the rule.

Mundy (Taibot). THE IVORY TRAIL. Constable, 1920. 7s in. 411 pp., 7/6 n.
A thrilling tale of African adventure, in which nates, lions, period-America explorers and German officials sustain their parts with equal spirit. Its motif is the quest (attended by international complications) for a semi-legendary hoard of ivory, secreted in some unknown and peculiarly unattainable locality. There is (mercifully) no love-interest, the distaff side being represented by an English titled lady. In German pay, who is called indirectly Lady Saffron Waldon, Lady Waldon, and Lady Isabel Saffron Waldon. The first half of the book is decidedly the better, horrors being afterwards piled on too thick for any ordinary digestion.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.
Luffmann (C. Bogue). THE HARVEST OF JAPAN: a book of curious travel, with some account of the trees, gardens, agriculture, peasantry, and rural requirements of Japan. Jabez, 1920. 9 in. 276 pp., index, 12/6 n. 915.2 Conscientious thoroughness is Mr. Luffmann's virtue, but he fails in attractiveness. A professional student of agriculture, he devotes half his book to that subject; but he is at his best in his attempt to reveal the Japanese instinct in art, and at his second-best in his evaluation of their gardening and his efforts to penetrate the mind of the people. Those who know the Japanese will find the book interesting.

930-990 HISTORY.
Brown (Percy). GERMANY IN DISSOLUTION. Melrose, 1920. 7 in. 316 pp. ill., 6/6 n. 943.055 With the British forces at the beginning of the war, somewhere behind the French or British front after the second battle of Ypres, a prisoner of war at Ruhleben, and then a witness of the revolution at Berlin, Mr. Brown had a war correspondent's varied experiences, and relates them without compounding in great detail. "Judging by what I saw during my last visit to Germany," he says, "I believe that in spite of differences between capital and labour, Germany is quietly and thoroughly putting her industrial house in order. The huge munition factories have been adapted to peaceful purposes ... Everywhere I went I found people working in the fields. . . . The majority of Germans suffer little more than we do from the scarcity of fuel."

Penty (Arthur J.). A GUILDSMAN'S INTERPRETATION OF HISTORY [1920]. 9 in. 327 pp. ind., 12/6 n. 940.1-2 The author remarks that the "neglect of the experience of the past is no new thing; it is as old as civilization itself." But there is now a general recognition that a study of the past is of the highest service, as well as of the present. In the light of the past, it is necessary to the understanding of human progress. Mr. Penty admires the spirit and customs of the Middle Ages. He blames the lawyers for the corruption of every medieval institution by Roman Law, and considers them responsible for the adoption of direct action by Labor. He believes that the history of civilization is merely the history of class struggles; criticizes what he calls the heresies of Marx; and is opposed to Bolshevism. "A Bolshevik government," declares Mr. Penty, "is a thing to be feared as the worst of all tyrannies.

*Hesketh-Prichard (Major H.). SNIPING IN FRANCE. Hutchinson, 1920. 9 in. 269 pp., 12/6 n. 940.41 Now that the cessation of hostilities has made it possible, those people who desire to learn something of the mysterious technical side of warfare will find Major Hesketh-Prichard's volume of much fascination. Before the war the author was known as a sportsman, traveller, and athlete; and if the qualities engendered by these pursuits enabled him to do considerable service in the scientific education of snipers and scouts in the British forces, it is his other vocation, that of writer, which helps him not merely to give us information, but to give it in a form enthralling as any detective story. Although the science of camouflage as applied to earthworks is expounded for the first time, it is by Major Hesketh-Prichard's presentation illuminated and vitalized to a degree which does not dispose of its authoritative nature. Not only are incident and anecdote used generously, though with discrimination, but there are photographs and drawings to assist considerably in making us understand the importance of apparently trivial objects in the sniper's work. The looting of a cat, for example, on the paradox of a supposedly disused enemy trench revealed that it was in reality an active headquarters.

Hilton-Young (E.). BY SEA AND LAND: some naval doings. Jack [1920]. 9 in. 362 pp., 12/6 n. 940.45 With Rear-Admiral Troubridge on the Danube, trying to cut the German communications with Bulgaria, a witness of the Serbian horrors, then in the North Sea chasing German cruisers, next with Kerr's naval gun in Flanders, and finally, after being wounded on the "Vindictive," off to an adventure in Russia, the author has plenty to tell, and good deal of it is interesting.

Steele (Harwood). THE CANADIANS IN FRANCE, 1915-1916. Fisher Unwin [1920]. 9 in. 364 pp. maps, app. index, 21/6 n. 940.4 Stated to be the first complete record to be published of the activities of the Canadian Army Corps during the war, this history—though it is entirely unofficial—gives an excellent idea of the operations which the gallant troops from the land of the maple leaf carried out in the presence of the enemy. Captain Steele has the gift of clear, straightforward description; and there is little to be desired in the succinctness and clarity with which he etches in a number of Homeric incidents.

NICOLL SUITS

When wanting a suit, don't let price alone decide where you get it—give some regard to the quality of the materials and work.

The man who bases his decision entirely on price may just as well adopt the cheap self-advertisement of wearing dungaree overalls—to one will expect them to fit or look well.

Not so with the suit: if it does not look well, fit well, and wear well, good money has been thrown away. NICOLL SUITS give you the best value throughout—good material, good workmanship—good fitting, and consequently a suit good to wear, because you feel it is not only all a suit might be, but all a suit should be.

There is the completing satisfaction that the price paid has been moderate—decidedly moderate—and the money well expended, in fact, that the suit is cheap in point of price, but exceedingly good in point of quality.

ICHABODINGS

If we confess that there have been moments when we were more than a trifle pessimistic about the condition of the arts in England, is because those moments are no more. The reading of Sir Reginald Blomfield's recent lecture to the British Academy has dispatched them for good and all. Remove the straw, take the mugler from the knocker and show a glad face at the window, for art can be neither dead nor dying nor moribund while it provokes Sir Reginald's leonine thunder.

"One had hoped," said the distinguished lecturer, "that the grip of reality brought about by the war would have cleared this rubbish [that is, all painting, sculpture, and architecture not by Royal Academicians] away; but at present the last state of this man is worse than the first. The seven devils have entered in and rallied their forces for a final attack on our sanity." Let us not linger over the richly metaphorical nature of the conception; let us pass lightly, or we shall find ourselves faced by the nice question as to whether we have gripped reality or reality has gripped us, for Sir Reginald, in the fever of his indignation, has had no architectonics to spare for his prose style. Art has gone to the devil, to seven of them. Such is the contagion of his sternly prophetic manner that we find ourselves crying Ichabod. Who indeed could help crying Ichabod after reading "poster les bourgeois et leille lacrime" in two consecutive lines? But let that pass. We turn to examine our conscience, for we—that is, the critics—if we are not the devils ourselves, are responsible for letting them in. On this point Sir Reginald feels no shadow of doubt whatever; we are the "bawling Cleons" who have debased British art. All was well in Eden until the first modern art-critic was born. But now things are come to such a pass that "one may well ask [says Sir Reginald] 'Am I off my head, or is the man who tells me this?' It is time that a halt was made in this race for the lunatic asylum. Non tali auxillo nec defensoribus isis will art advance." And those treacherous defenders include not merely the gentlemen with positive views and a talent for expressing them who explain the mysteries of art to you, dear reader—not merely those, but all critics. The painful history reminds us of Stacy Marks's little rhyme:

I paints and paints,
Hears no complaints,
And sells before it's dry;
When savage Ruskin
Sticks his task in,
And nobody will buy.

The difference is that all critics nowadays are Ruskins.

But, tempted though we are to bow to Sir Reginald's authority and to believe in our own omnipotence, the facts are against him. Has he forgotten that work of a Royal Academy artist—that pretty little thing in granite with marble trimmings which is called the Nurse Cavell monument? We critics declared with a single voice that it was intolerable. Was it removed? Was it covered with a veil? Alas! our royal writ did not run to the top of Chandos Street. We are glad to remind Sir Reginald of the incident; he will find in it matter for consolation, matter for hope. In a vision we see him, standing in Trafalgar Square, in the congenial shadow of a Nelson lion, gazing at this triumphant example of the undefiled tradition, and murmuring with confidence and pride: "This is one of the great achievements of British art against which the gates of Hell, aye, and the seven devils, were unable to prevail."
THE DISTORTED MIRACLE

This is a snapshot of Japan, taken under rather grotesque circumstances—Japan seen for a fortnight through a fever of 101 degrees. Japan was responsible for this fever; the excitement and expectancy of Japan were also responsible for a determination not to give way to the fever, but to keep going; yet this article reflects no reproach on Japan. Its surface is too small for reflection; if it reflects anything, it reflects a temperature of 101 degrees and no distorted miracle.

The first miracle of Japan, Fuji-yama, is proved impossible of distortion. The gods, I gather, proved it so by experiment. Gods seem to be creatures with a craving for interference with their superiors, and their instinct in this case was like that of some parents whose child finds a perfect thing—an instinct to draw a moral and to destroy. When the delicate and austere lines of Fuji were first leaned together over a pearl mist, man, being given eyes to see, at once found a heart to worship and to find holiest of all this pointed tower of cloud and delight upon his horizon. But the gods had strong opinions about the use of superlatives. It seemed to them, as it might have seemed to us, exasperating to be surpassed by a thing one had just that minute run together, so to speak. Perhaps they tried to spoil Fuji, they interrupted her symmetry, they made one shoulder higher than the other. "Now look," said the gods to man, "and remember, no creation ever surpasses its creator." The gods show up badly all through this story, and of course they were wrong. The fact is that few creations are really worth creating unless they be more perfect than their creators. And Fuji-yama was so perfect that she could not be spoiled; even in her unsymmetry, man—who is certainly the hero of this story—saw perfection. So he ceased not to worship Fuji. Indeed, all his most inspired temples in Japan have been crowned with just that degree of unsymmetry, a monument to man's redeeming obstinacy, and to his eternal victory over mere gods.

Fuji, that lily of heaven, has no roots on the earth, it seems. As you approach Japan from the east, you can see distinctly the way common and credible mountains grow, for there they are, a perfect garden of them, in many colours, with their roots in the sea, and—one of them—flowering fantastically in a halo of pale smoke. Only after you have enjoyed a moment of commonplace pleasure, and have said, "How beautiful those mountains are!" do you look up and see Fuji, and then your heart stops.

I saw Fuji twice again, but never without something like terror. Once, smiling in the sun, in a surprisingly restful mood, over her strange span of empty sky; she had small round clouds, strung alternately with their shadows, like varied pearls, round her shoulders, and very far below her the little square-sailed sampans were flung about a flecked and lively sea, like shavings dropped from the bench of creation. Two separate dreams with oblivion between. . . . And once I saw Fuji in the dawn, as delicate as a shell in the dawn, and fearfully alone.

All the other mountains in that half of Japan are content to be but foothills, because of Fuji-yama; everything else is respectfully small. I met only one other giant in Japan. His name is Buddha, and he sits in a garden at Kamakura, looking at nothing. He don't know facts about him, how many feet high he is, how many hundred years he has sat there, looking at nothing. I only know that I never saw a face so very far away, open eyes so absolutely and so terribly unaware of all the things that matter so much to our eyes—daemons and stars and gold money and the little nervous workings of our hands. By the time I met that giant, fever was in my own eyes, and he was appalling to me. I could have shaken the stars like cherry-blossoms out of the sky, I could have torn to shreds that futile and wistful garden, planted so lovingly about his uncaring feet, and all because I knew he would not know. He would sit among the ruins of worlds, not patient, not scornful, not defiant, simply unaware.

By then the fever was on me, and all Japan began to frighten me because it was so unreadable. All Japanese faces seemed to have the eyes half open and those eyes were fixed on something else. Something unknown and fantastic seemed to be behind those eyes, and there was no attention paid to the moment, the mere Now. To all the warning noises of the street, to the soft Owf of the rickshaw man, to the hoot of the rare motor, to the cry of the carter, dragging his savage and gaudy little skittered horse, there is a reaction in the passer-by so slow and so belated as to be almost dreamlike. It is as though a spell bound the silent streets, and directly you suspect this you at once feel sure of it. For there is a charm of small dream-like noises abroad in the streets, no sound more alert or more sudden than the shuffle of geta, or wooden clogs, on the soft ground. There is no interruption to thought, no rude recalling of the mind. The music of the street cries, though insistent, does not intrude; it haunts the air, as it were, behind a veil. A vendor of some food that swings in great wooden bowls at either end of a pole across his shoulders blows a dim faery flute on one note; the blind masseur has a forlorn muted cry; the clank of the watchman’s ringed metal pole is thin and tenuous, and so regular that it is part of the silence, like the ticking of a clock; and there is a man in a wheeled booth who competes tenderly for the public ear with a small fantastic minstrel, noise of notes, like the ghost of the first bagpipes ever blown. But it seems to me that I have never seen the public attention arrested by these things. The public is thinking of something else. Whenever there are flowers, Japanese eyes look at flowers, but otherwise—at something that is not there. I thought at first they looked through To-day to Yesterday, now I wonder whether they look through To-day to To-morrow.

Superficially speaking, Yesterday trespasses everywhere in Japan. The coolies are in themselves like an invading army from Yesterday. They wear blue doublets printed with curious medieval designs, and on their legs long blue tights with no shoes; round their heads they wrap a tawny and unclean length of stuff. I am sure that Yesterday saw just such figures—varlets, and hired soldiers home from the wars—swaggering sullenly down the dim leaping streets of old cities of another hemisphere, five hundred years ago. It seems to me that I have seen the feet of Time tangled in a net of very narrow, grotesquely banded streets, the feet of a lost and astonished Time treading aimlessly those worn and cedar-shadowed stone steps up to dark and cynical temple doorways. All Japanese temples have heavy and bent brows, but they do not frown, I think, they only shut their souls to all comers; to Time itself they shut their eyes. They have not forgotten To-day because To-day for them is not. Is To-day only a dream after all? When I think of it, it seems to me that I lose what I seek. Was it the fever that haunted me always from that first jewelled and impossible sight of Fuji-yama to the night when, in a cloudy and faery moonlight, we left Formosa, tangled in legends and in storms, behind us? Or is To-day really a stranger in Japan, a stranger and a ghost passing unseen, before cold half-shut eyes?

Poetry

THE PIER-GLASS

Lost manor where I walk continually
A ghost, while yet in woman's flesh and blood!
Up your broad stairs, mounting with outspread fingers
And gliding steadfast down your corridors,
I come by nightly custom to this room,
And even on sultry afternoons I come,
Drawn by a thread of time-sunk memory.

Empty, unless for a huge bed of state
Shrouded with tragic curtains drooped awry,
The flooring littered with new-tumbled plaster
And mouldy straw where rats resort for courtship
On their rogues' holiday. Here at my right hand
A dismal bellrope hangs in readiness
To summon me, from attic glooms above,
Service of elder ghosts: here at my left
A sullen pier-glass, cracked from side to side,
Scorns to present the face (as do new mirrors)
With a lying flush, but shows it melancholy
And pale as faces grow that look in mirrors.

A rumour, scarcely yet to be reckoned sound,
But a pulse, quicker and slower; then I know,
As I know all things here, without reflection,
That bees have swarmed behind, in a close place
Pent up between this glass and the outer wall,
And that bee-serjeants at the entrance chink
Are sampling each returning honey cargo
With scrutinizing mouth and commentary,
Slow approbation, quick dissatisfaction.

Disquieting rhythm! for in this judging mood
I face again a problem sternly solved
In a bygone life, and now again proposed
Out of due time for fresh deliberation.
Did not my answer please Omnipotence?
Yet I'll stay obstinate. How went the question,
That simple question set on the elements
Of love and the wronged lover's obligation?

Kill or forgive? Still does the bed ooze blood?
Let it drip down till every floor-plank rot?
Yet shall I answer, challenging the judgment:—
"Kill! Strike the blow again: spine and shall come."
"Kill, strike, again, again," the bees in chorus hum.

Robert Graves.

A WISH

The fog had soaked the fields all day,
And drops of wet hung on the trees;
Then from the west a sounding breeze
Blew all the quiet fog away.

To stand once more upon the crest,
And see the earth below me lie,
All dim with mist, and watch the sky,
Red as the sun drops in the west;

And in the gleam of dying light
To stretch my hands out to the rain,
And never more be touched with pain
By footsteps in the road at night;

And when I've felt again the best,
And seen the earth grow dark and chill,
To turn my footsteps down the hill
And leave it all in cold and rest.

REVIEWS

THE FUTURE OF MR. MASEFIELD

Enslaved; and Other Poems. By John Masefield. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

We are grateful to Mr. Masefield for three things:—
for his creative energy, for his "interestingness," for the nature of his faith. Because in our review of "Reynard the Fox" (January 25th) we dwelt chiefly upon an element of fundamental weakness in his work, we desire on this occasion to consider his qualities under the aspect of their strength.

Of his creative energy we need say but little. His production speaks for itself. There has been an interval of barely six months between the appearance of "Reynard the Fox" and that of "Enslaved," and, on the whole, this volume marks a higher level of achievement than "Reynard the Fox." There are some passages of true poetry in it, notably a half-dozen stanzas in "The Hounds of Hell" where the saint, hunted to the brink of death by the hounds he had tried to exercise, leaps through a stream to Paradise:

He waded to a glittering land
With brighter light than ours:

The water ran on silver sand
By yellow water-flowers.

The fishes nosed the stream to rings
As petals floated by,
The apples were like orbs of kings
Against a glow of sky.

The stanzas themselves are beautiful enough; but more beautiful is the perfection with which the emotional change is made—the sense, truly conveyed, of a passing from pursuit to paradise. Mr. Masefield is not quite successful in keeping his vision cool and limpid; he falls in attempting a higher metaphorical flight:

Lilies like thoughts, roses like words
In the sweet brain of June;
The bees there, like the stock-dove birds,
Breathed all the air with croon.

That, it seems to us, is a very bad verse; but bad with a badness which has the intention and possibility of good. "Mind" for "brain" might have made the second line tolerable, but it would still have been bad. "On the sweet lips" would have made it better. The boomerang metaphor (lilies—thoughts—words—brain—June) is evidence of weakness: it means that the poet is uncertain of his imagination. He has to bring his metaphor back whence it began. A true and confident metaphor needs no such artificial endorsement. Further, the treble harshness of language in the last line ("breathe," "breathe with," "croon") is to us unendurable.

Mr. Masefield's energy makes him bold, but his boldness is rarely successful. As the two beautiful verses above show, his effect, when he gets it, comes from precision in the image, simply rendered. His endeavour to make his language striking in and for itself is not only frequently infelicitous—Mr. Masefield still handles words with very heavy fingers—but often compromises the real gift of vision which he has. In "Enslaved" he gives us this line of a ship hove-to:

Her planks shivered wrinkleings along her spilling sail.

Here we think Mr. Masefield's determination to keep away from the obvious has weakened, not strengthened the line; blurred, not defined, the picture it contains. The straightforward way of putting it, we imagine, would have been like this:

As she plunged, the wrinkles shivered along her spilling sail.

Mr. Masefield has thrown away the fine onomatopoeic effect of the first anapest merely in order to do violence to language—for less than no reward. "Wrinkles shivered" is awkward; but "plunges shivered," coming where it does in the line, is more awkward still. And after all why not: "As she plunged, a ripple shivered..."? "Wrinkle" is, a motionless word, whereas a "ripple" is always moving. To our sense the more obvious line would have been in every way better.

Mr. Masefield is inclined not to be obvious where he ought to be, and to be obvious where he ought not. If he had spent some of the energy he used in filling that line to the brim in giving a little weight and definition to this:

In the old un-autumned beauty that never goes away, or to this:

Oh white violet of a woman with the April in your face, it would have been well bestowed. The first of these lines shows by its weak ending that the violent coinage "un-autumned" was quite unnecessary, and the second means nothing at all; predicates nullity; evokes no picture; puts a blank in the place of the woman who is, luckily enough, not very essential to the story of hairs-breadth escape which Mr. Masefield has to tell. But the story would have gained by having a real heroine, instead of a white violet.

Thus we come, by a detour, to the interest of Mr. Masefield's poetry. It holds us. The stories of the "Enslaved," of "The Hounds of Hell," of "Cap on Head," or the short sonnet sequence are so told that we cannot refuse our attention to them. The question is whether we are interested in them, as poetry: and it is not really pedantic to ask. That poetry should interest, deeply and passionately, we are confident; we are not sure that it should interest in the way Mr. Masefield's poetry too often does. Of course it is far better to interest as Mr. Masefield does than not to interest at all, or to interest only by suavum, just as a good detective yarn is better than a pretentious psychological novel. But the story interest and the poetic interest are different things.

The function of the poet is to blend them intrinsically. His characters will be such as will lend the story a significance beyond the mere issue of the event, or, from the other side, his story will be such as will give him the opportunity of revealing his characters; and he will somehow manage to saturate the whole story with a quality of emotion that will link it to the universe.

We believe that Mr. Masefield aims at this emotional saturation. He is deeply sensitive to the beauty that is immanent in life as a whole. In "The Passing Strange" he has these three simple and beautiful lines:

Gathering, as we stray, a sense
Of Life so lovely and intense
It lingers when we wander hence...

That is the deeper theme of his book, and we confess that it is very sympathetic to us. At the same time we feel that it is stated far too often, and is conveyed not only by suavum, but by a deliberate attempt to convey it in a way that is less effective than, for instance, in "Troilus and Cressida." It was capable of the most subtle beauties in handling; but Mr. Masefield has not been very sedulous about realizing them.

Yet we are inclined to believe that he might realize them. It would be a very hard task, because his use of language is the least fitted for the rendering of subtleties. Its principal characteristic is a melodramatic juxtaposition of primary colours. That is a method, a style, which can be excellent on occasion when the poet has to express a violent contrast of emotion—our first quotation shows it perfectly used—but as a normal manner it is inflexible and tyrannous. After all, a poet can only express what his vocabulary will allow, and once he has got into the habit of saying things like "downhearted like the dead" or "red with rage and pale with lust" or "mad with misery," the range of emotions he can give utterance to is very restricted. If to be downhearted is like being dead, what is he to say of being really dead? and if people are so often mad with minor afflications, what is he to do if one really is mad? It seems as if Mr. Masefield's first business is to regain control of his words; and that he can only do this by deliberately attempting a subject that bristles with psychological nuances, and insisting that his language shall accommodate itself to them. Otherwise we fear he will never succeed in expressing that elusive beauty which he sees, but which at present comes to us only in assertion or in fitful gleams through the interstices of an opaque style.

Perhaps Mr. Masefield would reply that he chooses a violent and simple handling of a violent and simple story on purpose; that he deliberately aims at writing a kind of poetry which will be read by thousands. But we take no objection to that; what we ask is that he should be rather more aware of the difficulties of writing popular poetry which is also good poetry. It can be done; it ought to be done. Shakespeare wrote immortal melodramas. But it is a supremely difficult business, and we incline to believe that it is hardest of all to accomplish in narrative poetry. In the drama, on the other hand, a poet can interest the people in the action without a premature waste of that energy which must go to making them talk poetry; in a narrative poem he has to spend most of his force in producing the illusion of action, he has to describe what the dramatist may simply present. It is not surprising that the poetic interest languishes under neglect. The poet cannot attend to everything.

Mr. Masefield may, however, be convinced that the drama is not possible under present conditions, and that his own experiment is more promising precisely because it has proved to be more popular. If that is so, it seems to us that it is his duty as a poet to treat his genuine gift for arousing dramatic interest as so much scaffolding for the creation of the interest that is properly poetic. He must aim at a more balanced precision of image, a much less summary psychology, and at the continual refinement of technique by which alone these achievements are made possible. Then, we imagine, at a moment when the violence and inflexibility have gone out of his language, that delicate mirage of beauty which he seeks will emanate from the substance of his poem and play over it, though the word "beauty" is never so much as whispered from the first word to the last.

Mr. Gosse's Taylorian Lecture "Malherbe and the Classical Reaction" (Milford, 2s. net), is extremely pleasant to read. It tells us nothing new, for the very good reason that there is nothing new to say about Malherbe; but all that there is to say is said by Mr. Gosse with an effortless felicity, as enjoyable as it is rare. We feel a sub-malicious twinkle when he says that Oxford is almost as prolific in poetry nowadays as was France of du Bartas and Desportes, and half-hints that the time is come for an English Malherbe. We do not quite understand why Mr. Gosse prints what he calls the best-known line of Malherbe in the form

Et, Rose, elle a vécu ce que vivent les roses, which compels him to say that the lady's name was not Rose, but Marguerite. We have never seen the line with anything but "rose" before.
AN EFFUSIVE FRIEND
A STRAIGHT DEAL; OR, THE ANCIENT GRUDGE. By Owen Wister. (Macmillan. 6s. net.)

Mr. WISTER'S purpose in his new book commands our sympathies. He has made it his object to clear up those American misunderstandings of England which are at present hindering the full development of an Anglo-American friendship. It appears that almost the majority of Americans have something very like hatred for England, a hatred which Mr. Wister considers to be the result of misleading propaganda. The average American's knowledge of such things as England's attitude during the American War of Independence, the American Civil War and so on, is, according to Mr. Wister, derived from school histories which, either by suppression or falsification, present England in an unduly unfavourable light. He has made it his business to correct these impressions by giving a different version of these events. There can be no doubt that Mr. Wister's main contention is correct, that lying and partial versions of historic facts are responsible for much hostile American feeling, and there is as little doubt that the presentation of the truth is the best method of countering such patriotic propaganda. But Mr. Wister's task has not been an easy one; in explaining England's attitude during the Civil War, for instance, he has been compelled to distinguish between the English Government and the English people. This is a perfectly valid distinction; this, indeed, a necessary distinction, even in a country which possesses so great a measure of democratic government as does England.

But there is a large part of his book which we are unable to reconcile with his principles. His language about Germany, for example, is uniformly of the kind that we leave to our "stunt" press. In fact, our "stunt" press is at present less extreme, less hysterical, less violently silly than is Mr. Wister. As one of his contentions is that America suffered far less than England in the war his excitement is the more curious. He does none of the things he asks his countrymen to do in the case of England; he does not question the sources of his information about Germany, nor is he willing to distinguish between the German Government and the German people. He is a quite simple and irresponsible "Wipe-em-outter." The complete absence of the judicial faculty in this case makes us regard Mr. Wister's arguments with more care. We must put on one side our natural complacency at being described so handsomely, and ask ourselves what effect this book is likely to produce on an American. We have a suspicion that he will find Mr. Wister a little disingenuous. Even we have felt a little embarrassed at some of his versions, and when we came to his account of England's treatment of Ireland we positively blushed. Mr. Wister is plus royaleste que le roi. Even the oldest and purpest of our retired Colonels in Capa and Australia as English colonies, standing on the same footing and governed by England in the same way. We do not know the American public. Perhaps Mr. Wister can convince it that India is an English colony with an autonomous army and fleet. Only he should not circulate these statements in England. An opponent of Mr. Wister's might well use his principle to point out that the confessedly best English publicists and a considerable part of the English press are ashamed of England's treatment of Ireland, just as they were ashamed of England's attitude toward the American Civil War.

No, Mr. Wister has good intentions, but he is just a shade too friendly. He presses our hand a little too enthusiastically; like the Oxford Professor whose works Mr. Wister so much admired, we say "Oh!" at the conclusion of his flattering remarks.
the plaintiff that "he walks fast and talks loud and carries a stick"—answer plaintively that these enormities are indeed true, but they are his by nature, and more his misfortune than his fault! And lastly, one may mention that happy criticism of Longinus comparing the ageing Homer of the Odyssey to the setting sun, less violent, no less great.

LE GRAND SIÈCLE

THE NATIONAL HISTORY OF FRANCE.—THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

By Jacques Boulenger. (Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)

As compared with the "Cambridge Modern History," the series entitled "The National History of France," which is appearing under M. Funck-Brentano's editorship, illustrates in a marked manner two different conceptions of how the past should be handled. Our people construct a good honest warehouse on the cooperative system, in which foreign politics, economics and religion are all conscientiously sorted and stored. Our neighbours entrust the work to one hand, and, behold, a theatre arises, in which high comedy is played. That somewhat pampered person, the "student," undoubtedly gains by the English method. Thanks to it, he can compose erudite essays on the Spanish succession or the internal reforms of Colbert. And if a knowledge of the Spanish succession and Colbert's political ideas was an end in itself, all would be well. But it is possible to cultivate the memory at the expense of the imagination, and to ignore the real meaning of an epoch in the presentment of an array of its facts. The French theatrical plan, which, after all, was more or less Gibbon's, has the advantage of giving other candidate for publishers' favours, the "general reader," something to catch hold of and assimilate. It would gain him poor marks, perhaps, in an examination paper, but he will lay down one of M. Funck-Brentano's volumes with the feeling that he is much more at home in the prescribed period than when he took it up.

Le Grand Siècle, as M. Boulenger rightly perceives, begins with the accession of Louis XIII, in 1610, and ends with the death of Louis XIV. in 1715, just as our own eighteenth century really starts with the Revolution of 1688 and ends with the meeting of the States General in 1789. It is essentially an age that lends itself to treatment in the comic spirit, alike in its incidents and its characters. Take, for instance, such an affair as the "Day of the Duples," and the battles of the Fronde, fought less on the field than on the bookstalls of the Pont-Neuf; take again those three formidable ladies, Mme. de Chevreuse, Mme. de Longueville and Mme. la Palatine, any one of whom Mazarin declared to be capable of overthrowing a monarchy, with their lovers and their flights in man's disguise, and we perceive at once the temper, perhaps not of Molière, but at least of Cyrano. It is true that the days darkened as the years lengthened, and that the bombardment of Bassompierre and the airy irresponsibility of Cardinal de Retz give way to the sardonic querulousness of Saint-Simon. Still Lauzun, that prince of comedians, whom even long imprisonment at Pigencul could not subdue, outlined the seventeenth century. Towards its close, though whole provinces were starving, Mme. de Sévigné's little Coutanges was fluttering butterfly-like from one great house to another, and scattering its deplorable verse:

Quel beau! quel buon! et quel mouton!
La bonne et tendre compagnie!
Chantons à jamais sur ce ton.
Quel beau! quel buon! et quel mouton!

Even war put on a comic aspect when La Grande Mademoiselle sallied forth, her head studded with the romantic sentiments of d'Urfé's "L'Astrée"; and at the siege of Lerida the Spanish Governor handsomely repaid the great Condé's violin serenade by a present of fruit and ice, with humble regrets that he had no music.

Dramatically considered, therefore, le Grand Siècle resolves itself into theatrical companies grouped round the principal comedians, Richelieu, Mazarin, called "Pantaloons" by de Retz, and Louis XIV. As a study in dynamics, it comprises a threepence for ascension oversea, at the expense of decadent Spain and of ill-considered Austria, preoccupied, besides, by the Turk. To that end was directed the cautious diplomacy of Richelieu, much more important, as M. Boulenger points out, than his domestic reforms; and Mazarin, too, was content with reasonable gains when he acquired Roussillon, the Cerdagne and a slice of Lorraine for France. But Louis XIV. was not content with expansion towards the north and east; he aspired to impose his paramount will over the world, and thereby brought two stubborn Powers, the Dutch and ourselves, into the field. His reign is as remarkable a sermon on the vanity of human wishes as Napoleonic, and like Napoleon he could not persuade himself to call a halt. His peacetime terms have been aptly termed "gnawing and encroaching" peace, which kept the world in a state of shadows, and when the great bat of the Spanish succession presented itself he gulped it down without scruple. Having failed to find successors to Condé and Turenne, whereas the Allies discovered consummate generals in Marlborough and Prince Eugene, it remained for him with a fine gesture to send his gold plate to the mint. The ruling motive of this magnificent personage, according to Saint-Simon, was selfishness, and though M. Boulenger puts it as vanity, they are, after all, two facets of the same vice. The point is that in no sense can Louis XIV. claim to be a true father of his people. Even Colbert's edicts, enlightened though they were, aimed in their rigid protection at nothing less than converting France into a self-sufficing fortress. In the famine year of 1709 his prescription was discovered to have failed, and throughout the reign, what with crushing taxes and the quartering of troops, the condition of the peasants, except in the south, was one of indigence. That is an unforgettable passage in Mme. de Sévigné's letters, setting forth how the poor Bretons were put to death in batches, after they had been regaled with some tobacco and cider. There she carries irony too far.

In France the seventeenth century was the age of concentration and the classical style, depending on definite rules. Provincial liberties were curtailed; the nobility became dependent. In this estatisme was suppressed, Fénélon had to bow the knee to authority, and Port-Royal only carried on an unequal struggle through its identification with Gallican liberties. In the same regulating spirit Mansart ruled improvisation out of architecture; Le Nôtre, like Sir Visto, taught gardening to have a taste, and Poussin initiated academic art. It was all very splendid; but all rather barren. Letters, too, centred in the great king, with Boileau as their prophet and La Fontaine, in his perfect limpidity, as their most characteristic example. Condé might object that though he could understand the Abbé d'Aubignac's obedience to the rules of Aristotle, he could not forgive the rules of Aristotle for having made the Abbé write such a wretched tragedy, but that was only a passing gibe. Order prevailed, though Molière was a rebel at heart, and it was under the royal sanction that he and Racine followed Corneille "round the world" in Dr. Johnson's phrase. "They have Fénélon," suggested Boswell. "Why, sir," was the reply, "Telemachus is pretty well." But "Telémache" belongs in spirit not to the tribe of Boileau and Bossuet, but to that of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Much might have happened if the Duc de Bourgogne had succeeded Louis XIV., with M. de Cambray at his elbow. Still Saint-Simon was also to be reckoned with, and the little duke was pertinacious.

COMMON-SENSE CRITICISM

Reputations. By Douglas Goldring. (Chapman & Hall, 7s. 6d, net.)

THIS is a seasonable book. Whatever may be our ultimate judgment of Mr. Goldring as a critic, this fact remains: he has located a discussed spot in the public literary consciousness, and has applied his knife. The result is a book of considerable immediate value.

We have bitter need at the present time for a reconsideration of critical principles; for a non-partisan criticism to disperse the isms of name-worship and of chaotic emotionalism, which are the part-legacy of war; and, in view of this need, it is refreshing to read Mr. Goldring’s brilliant and rather contemptuous onslaught upon public idols. We see him turning over the popular specimen of our modern literary merchandise, and hear him murmur, imperturbably, “Brummagem!” As imitations, they are, he admits, admirable; he recognizes the presence, demanded by modern competitive conditions, of a solid groundwork of technical efficiency at any rate in prose composition. Witness, for example, Mr. Wells, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Mackenzie. But what is the superstructure? Or rather, in what are those foundations laid? The spiritual energy demanded by “The Old Wives’ Tale” has become too much for Mr. Bennett—unnecessary, at any rate, for the bulk of his readers. How cleverly he has adapted himself! And did not the war make Mr. Wells a renegade? And is not Mr. Mackenzie, with his colossal elaboration of visible detail, an ingenuous poacher on the domain of the cinematograph? “What have they to say, these giants, now?” is the question; and the answer comes pat: “What the public wants.”

Most salutary of all is the paper “War and the Poets.” The poets themselves, save a few—Mr. Sassoon, Mr. D. H. Lawrence, Rupert Brooke—are passed over as comparatively innocent. For, after all, “the verse exercises of dead schoolboys” should rest in peace where they belong; but not so the reading public; it is the public, with its immense gullibleness, its sentimentality rotting the sinews of criticism, which is the proper object of scorn. “If we are to have,” we read, “a renaissance of poetry in England, we must have a new criticism to meet it;” a savage, rasping criticism, speaking with the bitter notes of an idealism which longs passionately for the best, and will no longer tolerate shams.”

To a point, then, we follow Mr. Goldring with a sense of reinvigoration. But, upon a closer consideration of his book as a whole, a suspicion assails us. We begin to wonder whither Mr. Goldring’s eminent rightmindedness and almost aggressive sanity will ultimately lead him. The “intellectuals” are as antipathetic to him as the entertainers; nor does he seem ready to admit that the former may play a more than trifling role in the social and cultural development of the nation. “A real book,” he says, attacking the mere bibliophile, “should send the reader back to life refreshed and stimulated.” Precisely; but it is also true that life, in its turn, should send us back with a deeper understanding to books. The alternation is endless, and Mr. Goldring seems unaware of it. Appreciating Mr. Goldring’s antipathies, we begin to ask what are his sympathies; we try, in some bewilderment, to construct his positive out of his negative philosophy. We seek dropped hints; but they are few. Of contemporaries he admires D. H. Lawrence; but his essay on that author is meagre. Of the ancients, Flaubert. Again, he puts in a plea for English chorus-girls. Why? Because of their pre-eminent technical efficiency, the quality, one supposes, for which he admires the great Frenchman. And yet, recognizing precisely this quality in contemporary English letters, he nevertheless condemns them because they lack its complement.

SOMETHING OUT-OF NOTHING

From the Log of the Velsa. By Arnold Bennett. With a frontispiece by the author and many illustrations by E. A. Rickards. (Chatto & Windus, 18s. net.)

HOW is it done, one wonders? What is the secret of this light, delicious cooking which knows how to make an appetizing dish out of practically nothing at all? One remembers the proceedings of Edward Lear’s “Four Little Children who went round the World”:

“During the daytime Violet chiefly occupied herself by putting saltwater into a churn, while her three brothers churned it violently, in the hope that it would turn into butter, which it seldom, if ever, did.” More successful than Violet and her three brothers was Slingsby, Gran and Lionel, Mr. Bennett has succeeded in whipping his saucepanful of salt water into butter. He rivals the achievement of the Quangle-Wangle in the same enthrancing travel-book: “As they had not tea-leaves, they merely placed some pebbles in the hot water, and the Quangle-Wangle played some tunes over it on an accordion, by which, of course, tea was made directly, and of the very best quality.” Whatever his methods, whether by a laborious churning or what seems more likely, by the mere magical playing of a few tunes on the accordion, Mr. Bennett has made an extremely pleasant book out of the stories of four quite uneventful yachting trips.

In his barge-built Dutch yacht, the “Velsa,” Mr. Bennett is as much at home on the open sea as on a canal. He takes us with him through Holland, along tortuous water-ways and over the shallow inundation of the Zuyder Zée; he penetrates the Kiel Canal and breezes the Baltic; he runs from Boulogne to Ostend in a tempest, and creeps inland down the broad poplar-fringed canal to Bruges; and with a good deal of bumping and grounding he negotiates the queer, muddy estuaries of Stour, Ore, Deben and Blackwater. This all happened, we imagine, in happy antediluvian days, when food was still fabulously cheap in Belgium and the freedom of the seas and land was still unlimited by passports and international suspicion. There would not be much fun now in exploring the fringes of Europe in a yacht.

Prospective tourists must not go to Mr. Bennett for precise information. Mr. Bennett concerns himself with other matters than those mentioned in Baedeker. True, some of the things he tells us are worth knowing, as, for instance, that there is a higher percentage of beauties among the female population of the town of Esbjerg in Denmark, than among women in any other part of the civilized world. But for the most part Mr. Bennett is less definite and statistical. He scoffs at the atmosphere of every town or province to which he goes, and tells us, like a skilled tea-taster, what he thinks of the local blend of civilization. In “stinking Schiedam,” for instance, he finds himself unexpectedly at home.

The tram, empty, with a sinking, but everlasting, white horse under a yellow cloth, was, without doubt, the most provincial and melancholy thing that destiny has yet brought me in contact with. . . . I got in. An age passed. Then an old workman got in, and saluted; I saluted. Save for the saluting, it was the Five Towns of the eighties over again, intensified, and the last tram out of Hanbridge before the theatre-tram.

It is out of little things like these, mingled with what seems an absurdly easy art, that Mr. Bennett has concocted his book. There is nothing in it, one assures oneself, nothing at all; and still repeating the words one finds oneself turning page after page till it is time to take regretful leave of the last.

CURRENT THEOLOGY

THE PHILOSOPHY OF FAITH; AND THE FOURTH GOSPEL. By Henry Scott Holland, D.D. Edited by the Rev. Wilfrid J. Richmond. (Murray. 12s. net.)

THE EPISTLES OF ST. JOHN. By Charles Gore, D.D. (Murray. 6s. net.)

In an interesting preface to the "Philosophy of Faith" Canon Richmond explains the situation in the philosophical world. When Scott Holland came up to the University T. H. Green was leading the revolt against the sensationalism of Mill, while Ruskin was raising the red flag against the traditional school of political economy. The Tractarian party had almost vanished from its native soil, and had appealed from the Universities to the parishes of the Church of England. It was the task of the "Lux Mundi" writers to restore the connection between the Catholic revival and the thought of the age. For this Green's philosophy furnished an excellent medium, and the "Philosophy of Faith" is a selection from Scott Holland's writings giving a general summary of his reconciliation of the new development of thought in the University with the creeds of the Church. Canon Richmond has succeeded in a difficult task. Scott Holland had his master's failings of using analogy as if it were the equivalent of demonstration, and bridging the gulf with a somewhat redundant and rhetorical emphasis of the closeness of the analogy. For example, in accordance with Green's teachings we are told that reason ventures out from itself, by an act of the human will, to find itself reflected in experience—it does not impose its own laws on the external world, but finds them in it. Similarly the universality of religion, which is itself an act of faith by which man passes out of himself in the search after God, proves the existence of the object which he seeks.

If we find in certain cases that the phenomenon has been all our own invention or production, or can be accounted for wholly out of our subjective reactions, then it is not a religious experience. We have mistaken its character. It fails to take its place finally in the body of experience on which we learn more and more to rely. If all true experience has an objective value of some kind or degree, then so has religious experience; it witnesses to the real. In we make proof of the real. We come into touch with facts. Religious experience, if it bears all the signs, and survives the tests by which a valid experience is proved to be real, proves to be the best justification the claim which all other experience makes. It can claim to prove the reality of its object. It can assert the existence of God.

Here we have an analogy which suggests the probability that the religious impulse has a corresponding object, but in no way demonstrates it. In other words, we have a statement of theology proving its compatibility with a particular school of metaphysics, and using its terminology, but dependent for its permanent apologetical value on the permanence of the philosophy on which it is based, and on the validity of the analogy between two distinct spheres of experience.

It is natural that this theology should draw its inspiration from the Gospel according to St. John. Although the view of the author as a trained philosopher of the school of Philo is exploded, he was none the less familiar with the catchwords of the thought of his Greek contemporaries, and endeavoured to use them for the expression of his thoroughly Jewish religious outlook. In "The Fourth Gospel" we have an able presentation of the arguments in favour of the historical accuracy of St. John as against the attempt to treat it as pure mythology. The same task is undertaken by Dr. Gore in "The Epistles of St. John." Both writers emphasize the details which appear inexplicable except as genuine historical reminiscences of an eye-witness, though neither makes as much use as possible of the details in which the author reveals his grasp of the vanished ecclesiastical politics of Jerusalem in the years before the catastrophe of 70 A.D.

The main value of both books from the Christian standpoint lies in their "prophetic" emphasis of the difference between the Christian standard of life as laid down in the Johannine writings and the conventional standards of society, which have been generally accepted as their equivalent since the peace of the Church. It was the grasp of this difference that inspired the Christian Socialism of the latter half of the nineteenth century. The developments of industrial democracy have tended to confine that movement to those who are prepared to identify the Christian doctrine of brotherhood with a particular set of economic formula. None the less, it is a serious loss to the Anglican Church that the spirit which inspired the Christian Socialists and still inspires Dr. Gore seems to be growing less fashionable, and that, with a few notable exceptions, its leaders are tending to fall back on the view that the Church can ignore the economic and political difficulties of society in general. Both writers realize that an orthodox Christianity can only prevail by upholding a higher ethical standard than its competitors, a realization which was largely responsible for the early victories of the Catholic revival, and which its present exponents must remember if they are not to lose what their predecessors won.

THE WELSH ENGLYN

CYFFRES Y WHERIN.—Rhih I. Blodfeuglwyr Enghlynoyn. Wedi eu dewis a'u gelygu gyda rhagymadrodd gan W. J. Gruffudd. (Swansea, Morgan & Higgs. 1s. 6d.)

The causes which in all countries have during and since the war threatened the production of literary work are specially serious in the case of Welsh books, which have, of course, a much smaller public than those in English, French or German; and the enterprise of a Swansea firm in starting the present "Cyffres Y Werner" ("Popular Library") is not less surprising than welcome. Well printed on good paper, and published at a remarkably low price, the Library is intended to be of an international character. The second and third numbers respectively are to be translations into Welsh of Ibsen's "Ghosts" and selected stories of Maupassant; and Gogol is another of the authors to be represented. The present volume, however, the first of the series, is purely Welsh, being a little anthology of englynion compiled, with an introduction on the origin and nature of the englyn, by Professor W. J. Gruffydd. The englyn (plural englynion) is an extremely interesting literary form. It may be described as a modern and Western counterpart of the Greek epigram or the Japanese poems made familiar to us by Mr. Waley and others; and at its best it does not, in finish, compression, and restrained force, fall below the masterpieces of those literatures. There are several varieties of the metre, but Professor Gruffydd confines himself to the most popular, which is also the finest, the englyn uniol tenion, a form which the late Sir John Rhys traced to the Latin elegiac couplet, written, as often in Celtic inscriptions, accentually. This theory, which Professor Gruffydd accepts and supports by further arguments, may well be correct, though it can hardly be regarded as certain. The englyn uniol tenion is a quatrain of thirty syllables (for, being scanned, like the other Welsh "strict" metres, neither by quantity nor by accent, it is reckoned in syllables, not in feet) arranged in the proportion: 10, 6, 7, 7. The first line is divided into two portions of, respectively, 7 and 3 syllables, less often 8 and 2, or, occasionally, 9 and 1. The second line is generally a single end-rhyme, which, however, in the first line falls not at the end, but on the final syllable of the first part; and this first part, the second part with the earlier portion of the second line, and the last two lines each form a separate cynganodd-period. Cynganodd is a characteristicly Celtic metrical device, of which three main varieties may be distinguished: internal rhyme; an elaborate system of alliteration, by which the consonants in the first half of the period are answered by the same consonants, in the same order, in the second half; and a combination of the two. The effect may perhaps best be illustrated by quoting an englyn from an English poem to the Virgin in Welsh metres, written by a Welsh poet of the fifteenth century. The original is written in phonetic spelling, but it is unnecessary to retain this.

In this copy the end-rhyme is indicated by italics, internal rhymes by thick type, and corresponding consonants by capitals:

Help us, Pray For us, Preferring—our Souls.
Assist us at ending. Make that we Fall to Fling.
Your Sons Love, only Sons Leaveth.

The englyn is not necessarily a self-contained poem. A long poem may be written in englynion, or, again, englymion may be introduced, along with other measures, into an acal, the ode in mixed metres for which the "chair prize" is given at the National Eisteddfod, and many of those contained in the present volume are extracted from longer poems; but the quatrains is seen to its greatest perfection when it stands alone, and at the National Eisteddfod a prize is regularly offered for an englyn on some set theme.

Obviously, in a poem so short the utmost compression is essential; there must be no otiose phrase, no slack or errant syllable. As Trebor Mai—by trade a country tailor, but by predilection a singularly neat epigrammatist—has said in an englyn not included in Professor Gruffydd’s selection: "A body shapely, apt, stately, supple, every member accordant, a body whole, no part forgotten, and in it a soul."

Its very perfection of form makes the englyn in strictness untranslatable. Often its excellence lies wholly in the expression, which can obviously not be transferred, and even when it enshrines an original thought, a striking image, or exquisite word-picture, it loses enormously from the necessity of inserting, in English, the weak of's and the's and a's with which Welsh can dispense. Nevertheless an attempt to render some specimens will perhaps be forgiven; and Professor Gruffydd’s excellent little selection, arranged by subjects and containing a great variety of englynion, is a rich mine of material.

The range of uses to which the englyn may be put is indeed remarkable. Now it gives immortal expression to some old commonplace like that of "home, sweet home," in the famous englyn of Llawdden (12th century): "The salmon, true to his trust, from fortune’s chance returns to its dwelling-place; after growing weary, roaming many a township, sweet it is to look towards home"; now a moral reflection, trite or profound, as in Tudur Aed’s "Truly there are tokens unmistakable in the twig’s growth; the man makes manifest of what quality is his root," or Robert ab Gwilym Ddu’s masterly epigram on the Atonement: "Why do ye wrong the Covenant or the Atonement and its power over sin? Tell me how great is the Godhead; even so great shall the Atonement be." Most often, perhaps, it aims at the next summarising in a theme at the characterization of an object of nature or art, at presenting a situation, and so forth. The following selection will illustrate its adaptability:

From Emrys on Peace: "Let art for ever in tranquility grow great under the shield of peace; idleness is the sword’s renown, and rust its honour."

W. Nicholson on the Poet: "To glades beyond nature he flies, and hears, in sweet amaze, the sound of some flood kissing the earth and heaving all its force.

Gwilym Cowlyd on the Cat: "Bearded, clawed and sportive is she, of dreadful mood; where she stealthily plays, death lurks among the chaff."

Ishen on the submarine cable: "Marvelous in the midst of ocean to wing man’s thought and his devising! A link through the bed of the anchor, lightning’s wing below the sea."

Annant on the Wave: "Gathering rage, the wave leaps from its slumber when man tests it on; there is Death on its mane, and man’s grave beneath it."

Cynddelw on "The Sleep Hour": "The hour of sleep has come silently, the hour of forgetfulness, over the ranks of being, the drowsy hour on the sultry shore of the sea men call mortality."

Sometimes the englyn contains a little vignette of natural scenery, as in Gwilym Cowlyd’s: "The quiet green lakes sleep in a mountain shadow, and the radiant sun descends on the veil of water the shape of day;" or Gwaltter Mchein’s: "The dark night silent, mist shrouding Eryri; the sun in the salt sea’s bed, and the moon silvery the waters;" and now into the beauty of nature comes the "still sad music of humanity," as in J. J. Williams’s picture of the moon shining on graves: "Cold all, beneath the fresh grass, they sleep under the grey stones; secure for ever she watches the bare cold bed of mortal men;" or Professor Gruffydd’s own englyn on a nightingale singing in a cemetery: "Ah, long-mute multitude, who carolled once so sweetly, is not, haply, your cold bed less hard for hearing her?"

Wit and humour do not figure largely in this selection, but Aled’s: "Epitaph on a deceitful woman" is very neat: "She spoke, while she lived, what she could of deceit; take heed lest you wake her, or methinks she will tell us all she has been in heaven."

This brings us to a genre for which the englyn, like the Greek epigram, is specially suited. Tudno’s epitaph on a sailor here takes a high place: "This is a sailor’s grave, out of reach of the rough sea and its thunder; he has been received into harbour, and no wave on the face of the water." Tegidion’s on a father and son—"The hush and tender leaf fell suddenly to earth; then the wind, the old impetuous wind, smote upon the tree"—may be set beside that of Gutyn Peris on a famous soldier: "I had praise in excess for wielding the sword, I had the form, I had the whole world and its greatness; lo here, to a little grave I am come in the end." Efion Wyn, in his epitaph on Heil Wyn, the young poet who lies buried on Pilkem Ridge, puts what many must have felt: "For our sakes, grievous were the blows and the pining in that conflict; and thy face too was there, and thy brave blood on the hot gravel."

But of all the war epitaphs perhaps the most perfect is Williams Parry’s on Llofri. Richard Jones, not included in this volume: "He gave his strength and his beauty for his country, for the hearths of peace; mourn, all ye his comrades, your shapely lad is quiet dust."

Lastly, the very passion of regret has rarely been better than in Ishen’s despair: "And to recall once more from the glen the pangs of your parting anguish, your long-breathed longing, and your look as you turned away. But what is this beside the Welsh?"

A galw yn o'r glyn eiwch-aingoed
Dy ddiwngedd artych,
Angonodd dynaidd math.
A’r diwrnod con, acen yw.

No, decidedly, those who would know what the englyn is like must learn Welsh.

At the Royal Anthropological Institute on Tuesday next there will be, from 3 till 7, an exhibition of Bronze Age implements, lent by Sir C. Hecules Read and Messrs. T. Allworthy, V. B. Crowther-Benyon, S. Fenton, and G. W. Willis.
A SCRAP-BOOK OF CELEBRITIES
PORTRAITS OF THE EIGHTIES. By Horace G. Hutchinson. (Fisher Unwin. 16s. net.)

NEVER elsewhere, we are tempted to suppose, has society effected on so large a scale so cunning and skillful a compromise with reality as in nineteenth-century England. Since the publication of "Eminent Victorians" the activities of this peculiar age are invested, one may believe, with a new interest for many—for those who realized keenly for the first time, thanks to that work of bright historical illumination, that beneath the rigidity of the elaborate convention stirred the rage, the romance, the storm and stress of forever primitive humanity.

The convention was not only elaborate, but deep and subtle. A phantasm was formed within the national consciousness, and only such things as confirmed the illusion or could be reconciled with it were acknowledged to exist. The other things, by a psychological sleight-of-hand, were flashed out of sight, at most little streaks of blackness that served in their passage to oblivion to enhance the general brightness. The process of ignoring the inconvenient attained a perfection which would be less readily explicable, had not psychology recently shown this method of repression, of purposeful forgetting, to be part of the general human armoury of defence in a universe bristling with uncompromising facts.

The phantasm of the Victorians was complicated, but perhaps its most important characteristics may be summed up in the term: Respectability. If a certain discredit attaches to the word nowadays, that is surely due not to anything repulsive in the thing signified, but to the Victorian mania for packing everything into this one blameless but narrow receptacle. Stuffed with objects it could not possibly contain, its sides refused to meet, its seams burst, it lost all likeness to a Gladstone-bag; and it was at last acknowledged that this convenient article of luggage could not alone meet the requirements of the social pilgrim.

The change from the heyday of Victorian blind security to Georgian blind unconcern began to stir in the general consciousness, perhaps, in the years between 1880 and 1890. It was then that Oscar Wilde indulged his taste for paradox, and concealed his slender wisdom with a glitter which has even yet not quite faded. Bradlaugh assailed the decorum of religion in its dusty niche in the House of Commons. From the depths sounded the chants of the City of Dreadful Night.

Mr. Hutchinson offers us a kind of scrap-book collection from this interesting age. The opportunities afforded by this portrait-series, of presenting against the social life of the day the personalities which gave it its comical direction and partook of its characteristic colouring, have not, we think, been used by Mr. Hutchinson, except somewhat half-heartedly in the case of the political world. The best sketches are perhaps those of Parnell and of the Duke of Devonshire; the former induces in the writer an unusual mood of speculation, which appears again in the chapter on Gordon; but in the latter case we suspect the influence of Mr. Strachey. There are too many (over 30) portraits and groups attempted in these 300 pages; comparatively few lines can be given to each, and Mr. Hutchinson is not master of the economy of telling and characteristic strokes.

The fortuitous medley of the scrap-book may, however, afford entertainment, and even a degree of instruction. The fact that Mr. Hutchinson has been personally acquainted with the originals of many of the portraits provides a degree of that thrill with which we listen to him who once saw Shelley plain.

THE FIRST BATTLE OF THE MARNE
THE BATTLE OF THE MARNE. By George Herbert Perris. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE first phase of the war, before the armies had settled down to the long period of positional warfare, still provides the most interesting study. It abounds in incidents which are little understood, which are provocative of violent controversy. It begins with forces ill-gauged, units and persons vague and shadowy; but it ends with the most momentous issues crystallized and with the emergence of soldiers as individuals who were to shape the destinies of Europe by their influence on the war. Some thirty French generals disappeared in this phase, and with them the German Commander-in-Chief and two Army Commanders. And many fine soldiers had proved their worth: Foch, Pétain, Castelnau, Mangin, Nivelle, and, of course, Joffre.

But the opening phases of the war still challenge the most criticism. Neither side seemed to grasp the issues at stake; and in the amateurish exchanges neither army did itself justice. If Lanrezac did not grip the battle of the Sambre, still less did Kluck control Mons as he should have done, and less again did Hausen seize the opportunities Joffre's faulty dispositions gave him on the Meuse. Castelnau failed at Morhange, as did the 4th and 3rd Armies on his left. But the Germans failed as disastrously in the Gap of Charmes. It was all failure in those days; but Joffre realized this, and apparently the German Staff did not. Smith-Dorrien fought heroically at Le Cateau, and in the larger purposes of the war this engagement played a far from negligible part. Mr. Perris would have done well to trust to his own critical judgment on this action. Sir John French's account is at least coherent, whereas Lord French's second thoughts are inaccurate and contradictory. Lanrezac showed his mettle at Guise; and after further vicissitudes the forces faced each other, between Paris and Verdun. There were few encounters in the retreat in which the Allies did not show superior weight and skill, and in the great test of the Marne these lessons were to be sealed.

The general lines of that battle are clear. Kluck had marched across Maunoury's and French's front, and the obvious conditions for an enveloping attack presented themselves. Whether we call this an enveloping or a "rectangular" battle in Mr. Perris's unfamiliar terminology, its course is the same; and it is necessary to insist upon it because Mr. Perris does not grasp it. The essential condition for success is that the whole front should be engaged, or otherwise the threatened flank will be strengthened with units drawn from other parts of the front. This is exactly what occurred. Kluck was too quick, too versatile and too bold for French; and most of the mystery of Maunoury's plight on September 9 is explained by the fact that our own splendid army had, like most armies, the defects of its qualities. The 5th French Army went forward with the greatest vigour; but the full weight of the British Army was not applied until Kluck had withdrawn all but a thin screen from in front of it. Both General Maurice and Mr. Perris are betrayed into over-praise of French's share in the victory of the Marne; and we can readily admit that the crossing of the Marne in the morning of the 9th saved Maunoury in a crisis without being shaken in our criticism. Maunoury would never have been in such straits if French had been more vigorous at once, and French could not have crossed the Marne if Franchet d'Esperey had not almost outflanked Béulow.
A PRIZE NOVEL
OPEN THE DOOR. By Catherine Carswell. (Melrose. 7s. 6d. net.)

OUT of the hundred manuscripts submitted to the publishers in their recent competition "Open the Door," was chosen to receive the prize of two hundred and fifty pounds. The judges are to be congratulated on their decision, for, while this novel is striking and unusual, it is eminently a serious piece of work and does not contain, in our opinion, those qualities which are necessary to a popular success. That is to say, it is head and shoulders above the class of books which are commonly called "best-sellers," it makes a genuine appeal to the intelligence as well as the emotions, and we do not doubt for an instant that it was inspired by the author's love of writing for writing's sake.

But when Mrs. Carswell's novel has been taken down from its small particular eminence and examined apart we must write more warily. "Open the Door," which is an extremely long novel—it has four hundred pages—that is, about one hundred and eighty thousand words—is an account of the coming of age of a young Scottish girl. By coming of age we mean, in this case, the moment when Life ceases to be a master, but, recognizing that the pupil has learned all that is needful gives her her freedom, that she may, in turn, give it to the man who holds her happiness in his keeping. So, from the age of thirteen to the age of thirty, we find ourselves—how is it best expressed?—in the company of Joanna Bannerman, her family, her friends and her lovers. We are told of the influences that hold back or help to unfold the woman in her; her thoughts, feelings and emotions are described with unrivaled sympathy and skill; but how much, when all is said and done, do we really know of her? How clearly is she a living creature to our imagination? She is receptive, easily led, fond of the country, especially fond of birds, pools, heather, the seasons and their change, and, since she is almost constantly aware of her physical being, her sexual desires are strong.

At eighteen, a little weary of fruitless emotion, a little dream-sick, the conviction had begun to force itself on Joanna that she was without attraction. For the past ten years she had lavished unreciprocated passion on individuals of both sexes. . . .

This persistent and deliberate search is perhaps peculiar to a certain character; but for the rest might not Joanna be anybody? We look in vain for the key to her—for that precious insight which sets her apart from the other characters and justifies their unimportance. The family group, for instance, is solidly stated, yet it is conveyed to us that of them all Joanna was the only one that really mattered, because she was the one who broke away. But we never felt her truly bound. And then the men—are they not the shadows of shadows? There is young Bob, who cries when he ought to have kissed her; her sensational Italian husband breathing fire, Ponder the man of the world, and in the background Lawrence, who without her "conceived of his life as a seed foiled of its consummation." They are men only in so far as they are male to Joanna female.

All would be well, in fact, if the author did not see her heroine plus, and we did not see her minus. We cannot help imagining how interesting this book might have been if, instead of glorifying Joanna, there had been suggested the strange emptiness, the shallowness under so great an appearance of depth, her lack of resisting power which masquerades as her love of adventure, her power of being at home anywhere because she was at home nowhere. Mrs. Carswell has great gifts, but except in her portrait of Joanna's fanatical mother, she does not try them. They carry her away.

WANTED, A NEW WORD

THE MILLS OF THE GODS. By Elizabeth Robins. (Thurston Butterworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

MY PROFITABLE FRIENDS. By Arnold Palmer. (Selwyn & Blount. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE GOLDEN BIRD. By Dorothy Easton. (Hoeinemann. 7s. 6d. net.)

SUPPOSE we put it in the form of a riddle: "I am neither a short story, nor a sketch, nor an impression, nor a tale. I am written in prose. I am a great deal shorter than a novel; I may be only one page long, but, on the other hand, there is no reason why I should not be thirty. I have a special quality—a something, a something which is immediately, perfectly recognizable. It belongs to me; it is of my essence. In fact I am often given away in the first sentence. I seem almost to stand or fall by it. It is to me what the first phrase of the song is to the singer. Those who know me feel: 'Yes, that is it.' And they are from that moment prepared for what is to follow. Here are, for instance some examples of me: 'A Trifle from Life,' 'About, Love,' 'The Lady with the Dog.' What am I?"

It does not appear from "The Mills of the Gods," however, that the question has ever troubled Miss Elizabeth Robins. The seven tales in this new volume are of a kind that might have appeared in any successful high-class magazine. They are wholesome, sentimental, and not so inconveniently thrilling that the train carries you past your station. Experience, confidence, and a workmanlike style—the author has it all three, and this far to disguise the hollowness beneath the surface, but the hollowness is there. There is not one of the seven which will stand examination. How is it that the author can bear to waste her time over these false situations which are not even novel? How can she bear to put her pen to describing the great-hearted, fearless, rude, swearing, murdering toughs who frequent the Golden Sand Gambling Hell at Nome? those types whom we know as if they had been our brothers, whose hats are off at the word "Mother," and who shoot the cook who denies them a can of peaches. And then to add to them a little golden-haired innocent child whose father dies, and whom they adopt and send to Europe to finish her studies, and want out of their heavy charge the fists telling her she is never to go out without her chaperone and they all send their love! Oh, Miss Robins! We are very, very weary of this kind of tale, and if we cannot refrain from smiling at the love story of the passionate Italian whom "his intimates in Italy and elsewhere" called Satarnuccio, it is not because we are amused."

"My Profitable Friends" contains a number of very clever sketches which ought to be more successful than they are. There is over them a strange breath of self-consciousness which blurs the effect of their sensitiveness and interrupts our attention, so that we have the uncomfortable and very cooling sensation that the author may at any moment be at hand to point out the subtleties. The book is not large, but it contains seventeen examples of his work; some of them are very slight, almost negligible, and perhaps it would have been better to cut down their number by half. On the other hand, it is interesting, when an author can write as well as Mr. Palmer at his best, to attempt to discover from the evidence what is his aim. We feel he has not yet made up his mind. In each story he makes it up again. His cleverness is indisputable; but when that matters to him a great deal less he will write a great deal better. At present he leans upon it—"as in 'Eve Folmyhampton'—and it carries him to just before the end; but then, when he has to throw it away and jump, it is kinder not to look.

It is Miss Dorothy Easton's happy fortune to be introduced to the public by Mr. Galsworthy in the kindest possible little speech. He describes the sketches in "The Golden Bird" as "little pictures, extraordinarily sensitive and faithful, and never dull." That is very just criticism, but it does not prepare the reader for the quality of the "little pictures." The writer gives us the impression of being extremely young—not in the sense of a child taking notes, but in the sense that she seems to be seeing, smelling, drinking, picking hops and blackberries for the first time. She has a passion—there is no other word for it—for the English countryside. The people she meets, she, in the frankest possible way, devours. There are still times when she mistakes sentimentality for feeling, and the little paragraphs at the end under the title "Moments" are rather a painful instance of this. But at her best her feeling for nature is exquisite. And for such sketches as "An Old Indian" and "From an Old Malt-House" we have nothing but praise. But while we welcome her warmly, we would beg her, in these uncritical days, to treat herself with the utmost severity.

MARGINALIA

In moments of complete despair, when it seems that all is for the worst in the worst of all possible worlds, it is cheering to discover that there are places where stupidity reigns even more despotically than in Western Europe, where civilization is based on principles even more fantastically unreasonable. Recent experience has shown me that the depression into which the Peace, Mr. Churchill, the state of contemporary literature, have conspired to plunge the mind, can be sensibly relieved by a study even superficial, of the manners and customs of Tibet. The spectacle of an ancient and elaborate civilization of which almost no detail is not entirely idiotic is in the highest degree comforting and refreshing. It fills us with hopes of the ultimate success of our own civilization; it restores our wavering self-satisfaction in being citizens of industrialized Europe. Compared with Tibet, we are prodigius. Let us cherish the comparison.

My informant about Tibetan civilization is a certain Japanese monk of the name of Kawaguchi, who spent three years in Tibet at the beginning of the present century. His account of the experience has been translated into English, and published, with the title "Three Years in Tibet," by the Theosophical Society. It is one of the great travel books of the world, and, so far as I am aware, the most interesting and the most authoritative book on Tibet that exists. Kawaguchi enjoyed opportunities in Tibet which no European traveller could possibly have had. He attended the University of Lhasa, he enjoyed the acquaintance of the Dalai Lama himself, he was intimate with one of the four Ministers of Finance, he was the friend of lama and lama, of all sorts and conditions of Tibetans, from the highest class to the lowest—the despised caste of smiths and butchers. He knew his Tibet intimately; for those three years, indeed, he was for all practical purposes a Tibetan. This is something which no European explorer can claim, and it is this which gives Kawaguchi's book its unique interest.

The Japanese, like people of every other nationality except the Chinese, are not permitted to enter Tibet. Mr. Kawaguchi did not allow this to stand in the way of his pious mission—for his purpose in visiting Tibet was to investigate the Buddhist writings and traditions of the place. He made his way to India, and in a long stay at Darjeeling familiarized himself with the Tibetan language. He then set out to walk across the Himalayas. Not daring to confront the strictly guarded gates which bar the direct route to Lhasa, he penetrated Tibet at its south-western corner, underwent prodigious hardships in an uninhabited desert eighteen thousand feet above sea level, visited the holy lake of Manasarovara, and finally, after astonishing adventures, arrived in Lhasa. Here he lived for nearly three years, passing himself off as a Chinaman. At the end of that time his secret leaked out, and he was obliged to accelerate his departure for India. So much for Kawaguchi himself, though I should have liked to say more of him; for a more charming and sympathetic character never revealed himself in a book.

Tibet is so full of fantastic low comedy that one hardly knows where to begin a catalogue of its absurdities. Shall we start with the Tibetans' highly organized service of trained nurses, whose sole duty it is to prevent their patients from going to sleep? or with the Dalai Lama's chief source of income—the sale of pills made of dung, at, literally, a guinea a box? or with the Tibetan custom of never washing from the moment of birth, when, however, they are plentifully anointed with melted butter, to the moment of death? And then there is the University of Lhasa, which an eminent Cambridge philosopher has compared with the University of Oxford—somewhat unjustly, perhaps; but let that pass. At the University of Lhasa the student is instructed in logic and philosophy; educated for his stay here he learns to know to five or six hundred pages of holy texts. He is also taught mathematics, but in Tibet this art is not carried further than subtraction. It takes twenty years to get a degree at the University of Lhasa, and then most of the candidates are ploughed. To obtain a superior Ph.D. degree, entitling one to become a really holy and eminent lama, forty years of application to study and to virtue are required. But it is useless to try to make a catalogue of the delights of Tibet. There are too many of them for mention in this small space. One can do no more than glance at a few of the brighter spots in the system.

There is much to be said for the Tibetan system of taxation. The Government requires a considerable revenue; for enormous sums have to be spent in keeping perpetually burning in the principal Buddhist cathedral of Lhasa an innumerable army of lamps, which may not be fed with anything cheaper than clarified yak butter. This is the heaviest item of expenditure. But a great deal of money also goes to supporting the Tibetan clergy, who must number at least a sixth of the total population. The money is raised by a poll tax, paid in kind, the amount of which, fixed by ancient tradition, may, theoretically, never be altered. Theoretically only; for the Tibetan Government employs in the collection of taxes no fewer than twenty different standards of weight and thirty-six different standards of measure. The pound may weigh anything from half to a pound and a half; and the same with the units of measure. It is thus possible to calculate with extraordinary nicety, according to the standard of weight and measure in which your tax is assessed, where precisely you stand in the government's favour. If you are a notoriously bad character, or even if you are innocent, but live in a bad district, your tax will have to be paid in measures of the largest size. If you are virtuous, or, better, if you are rich, of good family and bien peuant, then you will pay by weights which are only half the nominal weight. For those whom the government neither hates nor loves, but regards with more or less contempt or tolerance, there are the thirty-four intervening degrees.

Kawaguchi's final judgment of the Tibetans, after three years' intimate acquaintance with them, is not a flattering one:

The Tibetans are characterized by four serious defects, these being: filthiness, superstition, unnatural customs (such as polyandry), and unnatural art. I should be sorely perplexed if I were asked to name their redeeming points; but if I had to do so, I should mention first of all the fine climate in the vicinity of Lhasa and Shigatze, their sonorous and refreshing voices in reading the Text, the animated style of their catechisms, and their ancient art. Certainly a bad lot of vices; but then the Tibetan virtues are not lightly to be set aside. We English possess none of them: our climate is abominable, our method of reading the holy texts is painful in the extreme, our catechisms, at least in my young days, were far from animated, and our ancient art is very indifferent stuff. But still, in spite of Mr. Churchill and the state of contemporary literature, we can still look at the Tibetans and feel reassured. AUTOLYCUS.

LITERARY GOSSIP

Sir John MacAlister has transferred his magazine, The Library, which he has carried on for 30 years, to the Bibliographical Society, which will in future incorporate with it, in a quarterly form, its Transactions, litho issued in biennial volumes. We have received No. 1 of the new series (to which the annual subscription is 10s. 6d.). It is to be hoped that the members of the Society, and contains in addition to the 27th annual report of the Society, a very interesting paper by Mr. Farquharson Sharp on “Travesties of Shakespeare’s Plays.” He has traced 59 produced between 1792 and 1895. “Hamlet” is an easy first, having been parodied 18 times: “Othello” comes next with 8.

* * * *

The Academy is, we understand, to be revived. We hear that Lord Alfred Douglas, who edited it from 1897 to 1910, proposes to resume the issue shortly under the title “Plain English, with which is incorporated The Academy.” The office of the paper will be in Duke Street, Manchester Square. The reorganisation of the Academy, if a little tarnished in these latter days, is that of a fine fighting literary paper; we hope to enjoy its robust methods once more.

* * * *

We welcome the letter from Messrs. Constable on the subject of paper-bound volumes which appeared in our last issue. The fact that the booksellers in France find no difficulty in handling paper: volumes is incontrovertible; the vision of the French railway bookstall which the appeal conjured up, suggested a further question. Why is it that new books of real literary value are always in evidence on a French bookstall, hardly ever on an English one? Is the inferiority of taste in the English public, or the English bookstall-manager?

* * * *

That is another matter, to be discussed at another time. As for the attitude of the Circulating Libraries to the paper volume, we remember that Rolandi’s French volumes used to last very well in their extra wrapper of stout paper, so well indeed that it was always worth while buying the books on paper, in a form which was never thrown away. They were sensible enough to put the extra wrapper on immediately, and apparently this timely precaution saved them in the majority of cases from having to cose their books in cloth.

The correspondent who despises the prices of books is unfair in judging them by the standard of a 100-page Fabian Society pamphlet which is sold at a shilling. In the first place it is very doubtful whether that pamphlet, if printed now, could be sold profitably at 2s. 6d.; in the second, everything depends on the probable circulation of the book. A really good book on Ethics such as Mr. Stephen Ward’s “Ways of Life” has a very small chance of selling more than 2,000 copies. A Fabian pamphlet can probably be reckoned to sell five times the number. The first charge for composition is no heavier on an edition of 10,000 than it is on one of 2,000.

We gather from the character of their recent announcements that Messrs. Bell are turning their attention towards belles-lettres. Mr. Robert Lynd’s next book of essays is, we believe, to be published by them, and we have heard rumours that a distinguished section of the younger men of letters is to transfer its productions to this well-known firm. Messrs. Collins’ bold entry into the domain of belles-lettres from that of educational publishing is by now familiar to most book-lovers. The knowledge and enthusiasm of their literary adviser, Mr. J. D. Beresford, will undoubtedly be of the utmost advantage to the firm.

* * * *

If we may judge from the fact that Mr. Holbrook Jackson’s book on the Nineties is at a premium, the period is one which interests many at the present time. They will be pleased to hear that Mr. Davidson, of Charing Cross Road, will shortly publish “The Men of the Nineties,” by Bernard Muddiman, which is said to be a direct survey of their literary work. In many ways the best document of the period is Mr. Max Beerbohm’s imaginative story (which is not, as some have imagined, based on Ernest Dowson) of Enoch Soames in “Seven Men.” There is still plenty of room for a sympathetic critical study of a curious generation.

Writers, artists and musicians, we learn from the Mercure de France, are to have a little kingdom of their own. The islet of Cominica in the Lake of Como was bequeathed by Signor Augusto Caprani, who died in 1919, to the King of the Belgians as a testimony of his admiration of the heroic conduct of Belgium during the war. King Albert, in his turn, has made it over to the Italian Government on condition that it is made a place of residence for artists of every kind. The Italian Ministry of Fine Arts is to build little villas, one of which will be reserved for Belgians. There will be halls for exhibitions and recitals, and it is hoped that the island will be ready for occupation by the coming spring.

GUIDE-BOOKS

ENGLAND. Edited by Findlay Mairhead. “The Blue Guides.” (Macmillan. 16s. net.)

DUMBARTONSHIRE. By F. S. Mort.—ORKNEY AND SHETLAND. By J. G. F. M. Headle and T. Mainland. “Cambridge County Handbooks.” (Cambridge, University Press. 4s. 6d. net each.)

BOURNEMOUTH—BRIGHTON—NORTH WALES: NORTHERN SECTION. Illustrated Guide-Books.” (War & Locke. 2s. 6d. net.)

There are two classes of travelling—those who use guide-books and those who despise them. The latter may experience those instants of exquisite surprise such as one receives on being unexpectedly for the first time the cathedral of Milan or a snow peak in the Alps, but for these they sacrifice a great deal of time and some money. In the life of John Murray III. is related how he came to write his handbook and how this was imitated by Karl Baedeker. But before the war the Baedeker guides were paramount in Anglo-Saxon countries, and many of us have a shelfful on which we look even now with affection. When the war broke out, however, it was speedily felt that we should depend no longer on Leipzig for our guide-books. Mr. Findlay Mairhead, co-operating with Messrs. Macmillan in England and MM. Hachette in France, started a new series of guides which promise to be as much superior to those of Baedeker as the latter were to their predecessors. The first volume, on London, was published in 1918 and is already in its fourth impression. “England” is the second of the series and covers a very large amount of ground. Baedeker’s “Great Britain” took in Scotland and Wales, as well as England; Mr. Mairhead has bettered this by devoting his book of 600 pages to England alone. But he might have been still better advised if he had followed the Joanne system and divided England up into six or seven provinces, giving one volume to each division. For then there would have been more space to deal with the interesting matters that he has room only to mention, e.g., the poet
RUSKIN AND GEORGE MACDONALD

THERE has recently come into my possession the following unpublished poem by George Macdonald in honour of Ruskin:

To John Ruskin.
O friend, since I have seen thee this fair day,
The day is fairer; for its golden show
Long ere the evening, rosy all doth glow;
Thy face hath changed it—though it be not gay.
Not as a bridegroom's clad in radiant play,
But calm and strong, serene, divinely slow,
With sorrowing smiles that to my bosom go:
Thy soul looks forth crowned for a kindly sway:
Some men would hold thy sun was in the west,
And bid with the cloudy, its rays descend, flushed with a blood thy trembling heart hath shed,
Weary with waiting, and not being blest:
I say 'tis more that dawns in thy breast
Though dark-plumed night would brood the glory dead.

The poem bears the address of The Retreat, Hammersmith, where Macdonald lived. This is the celebrated Kelmscott House on the Upper Mall. The name was changed by Morris when he went to live in the house.

The poem is a reminder of a fact little known. There was a warm and intimate friendship between Ruskin and George Macdonald. Ruskin frequently visited him at Hammersmith and addressed some hundreds of letters to him. The house is also closely associated with the great tragedy of Ruskin's life—the interrupted friendship between him and Rose La Touche. Rose often stayed here with the Macdonalds, and the two frequently met. When the estrangement came, Macdonald nearly succeeded in bringing the two together again. The letters from Ruskin to Macdonald dealing with this episode in his life are still happily in existence.

It is a curious fact that the official biography of Ruskin contains no reference to this close friendship between the two men, nor any reference to the letters addressed by Ruskin to Macdonald.

SHEEP-THROUGH - THE - GAPISHNESS

The Group Mind: A Sketch of the Principles of Collective Psychology, with Some Attempt to Apply them to the Interpretation of National Life and Character. By William McDougall. (Cambridge, University Press. 21s. net.)

Professor Lloyd Morgan long ago succeeded in reducing the psychology of the crowd to a single phrase—"sheep-through-the-gapishness." Bacon is nearly as terse with his sequacitas et coito. To the philosopher the mob presents a pitiful spectacle. As compared with the educated individual, it exhibits a mental activity that is altogether of a lower order. It is incapable of reflection, and consequently of that true volition which is the outcome of reflection. Passion, on the other hand, is never so crude and violent in its transports as in a mobish atmosphere. By imitation of the outward expression of the excitement spreads like a contagion, and the beast that lurks in all of us is set free to do its worst. Plato, with the example of the Athenian democracy before his eyes, has depicted this essential bestiality of the crowd in immortal language. Modern psychologists; mostly Frenchmen who are not unmindful of their own "Terror," bring the indictment home by careful analysis of the conditions that determine such collective manifestations of blind impulse. To-day, when the world is faced by the revolt of the proletariat, these considerations, if hardly reassuring, are at least not inopportune. Mr. McDougall, whose tone is always calm, writes about these things with judgment, proving as usual his capacity to detach from the excitement nothing to gain, but everything to lose, from a régime of mob-rule. To look in this direction for the betterment of society is sheer atavism—l'a nostalgie de la boue.

And yet it would be fatal for the individual, however intelligent, to imagine himself superior to any body of men that feels, thinks, and wills in common. Thus we are, as Mr. McDougall says, confronted by a paradox.

Participation in group-life degrades the individual, assimilating his mental processes to those of the crowd, whose brutality, inconstancy, and unreasoning impulsiveness have been the theme of many writers; yet only by participation in group-life can man become fully man, only so does he rise above the level of the savage.

He solves the puzzle by supplementing his damning analysis of the mentality of the mob with an account of what he terms "the enlightened group spirit." For organization and the pursuit of purpose are not incompatible with group-life. Our own country, for instance, furnishes us with many instances of voluntary associations formed for the furthering of some public end. Mr. McDougall, indeed, says that, whereas their multiplication and development will prove to be one of the ameliorating factors of the future, softening the asperities of commercial life, correcting to some degree that narrowing of the sympathies, and preventing that tendency to class antagonisms, which purely commercial associations inevitably produce," yet the difficulties peculiar to effective common action should not be overlooked. Not only must the collective aim be clearly envisaged, but the sentiment of co-operation must be fostered; and hereupon the tendency of all group-life to encourage emotion at the expense of thought and will comes, at once into play. Group-loyalty depends on the possession and cultivation of tradition. Thus a Church or a college owes its stability as an institution largely to customs that enshrine the memory of an honourable past. On the other hand, as Mr. McDougall points out, "tradition tends to overshadow purpose." The purely traditional group such as the Indian caste attains to a rigidity that brings utter futility in its train. When he turns to find his new method for self-improvement on the part of the group of partly traditional, partly purposive type, Mr. McDougall characteristically looks for it within the sphere of the sentiments, and suggests emulation with similar groups as the chief educational lever. Thus there can be no doubt that inter-collegiate rivalry supplies the life-blood of our ancient universities with most of its oxygen.

The same principle, presumably, holds with the rivalries of nations. Two-thirds of this book is devoted to the study of "the most interesting, most complex and most important kind of group mind, namely, the mind of a nation."

An international form of group mind is not considered, possibly because it hardly comes within the province of the actual and hence within that of a positive science such as psychology. For the rest, it is doubtful whether Mr. McDougall's reading of history leads him to believe in an ultimate "parliament of man." Evidently he is struck chiefly by the differences between peoples—differences so radical that in his opinion they cannot in extreme cases interbreed without producing monsters. Throughout the latter portion of his work the psychological interest is subordinate to the biological. Culture is, indeed, on the face of it a spiritual affair. The customs of a nation are primarily those which it chooses to adopt. But why does it choose so? Must not an ethnic psychology utilize that as a subjective factor, namely a peculiar heredity, in the end determines the selective process of which culture is the result? Unfortunately, the practical difficulties in the way of separating the hereditary from the purely acquired features in national character make all such conclusions regarding the preponderance of the element of race or breed seem somewhat speculative. Soundly empirical as his methods are, Mr. McDougall may well fail to convince the ardent humanitarian of the error of his ways. Yet it must, at least, be admitted that it is precisely in respect to their emotional endowment that the various peoples show the greatest diversity. Now, thanks to psychology, modern philosophy in all its branches has come to understand that intellectualism is the enemy. The shallow observer begotten by the belief that ideas as such can move the mind is destined to go down before a deeper knowledge of the springs of human nature. Emotion, then, as the study of the group mind brings out at every turn, is the key to character, individual and national. It reflects the national bias, and shows that men are not born equal. Yet this does not imply on our part a policy of fatalism. We can largely determine the destiny of future mankind by breeding from the best. It may be that we do not yet know fully how this is to be done. Nevertheless, the problem of a national policy comes to be faced and solved, not simply buried on sentimental grounds. Meanwhile, whatever moral be drawn from them, the facts must first be reviewed impartially; and Mr. McDougall's book is the model of a treatment conceived and executed in the dispassionate spirit of science.

R. R. M.

THE LIBRARIAN'S report showed that the total additions to the library during the year were 243 volumes and 876 pamphlets.

The following were elected officers: President, Dr. A. S. Woodward; Treasurer, Horace W. Monkton; Secretaries, Dr. B. B. Brown, Jackson, Professor E. S. Goodrich, Dr. A. B. Kendall.

The President then delivered an address on certain groups of fossil fishes, illustrated by a series of lantern-slides. He afterwards handed to Dame Helen Gwynne-Vaughan the Trail Award and Medal and to Sir Ray Lankester the Linnean Society's Medal. June 3.—Dr. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

Dr. Geoffrey Douglas Hale Carpenter, Miss Theodora Lisle Frankerd, Miss Lucy Ellen Cox, and Mr. H. Bertram Harding were admitted Fellows.

E. G. Bloomfield Meade-Waldo, Pyari Mohan Debbarman, Professor O. V. Darbishire, W. Rickatson Dyles, Professor Shankar Prasashottam Agharkar, Dr. John Wishart, Howard Hamp Crane, Capt. Eric Fitch Dalglish, Bertram Henry Buxton, and Professor Otto Rosenheim were elected Fellows.

The President announced that Lady Crisp had offered an oil-painting by James Sant, R.A., of the first admission of women as Fellows of the Linnean Society, which the Council had accepted. The portrait shows a series of 90 water-finish drawings of Colonies, Elicon guncinosis, by Mr. R. Swinson Hall, were lent for exhibition by the Director of the Imperial Institute, Dr. Wyndham R. Dunstan, and explained by Dr. A. B. Kendall. This was followed by an exhibition of Mr. A. W. Kellett over the neighbourhood of Basra during the war, with lantern-slides of the country and the people. Professor W. J. Dakin showed a large series of photographs, as slides in the lantern, of whaling in the Southern Ocean, giving detailed description of the operations by a Norwegian association. Mrs. Rose Haig Thomas contributed further observations on a former whaling station in the Hebrides.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND.—June 9.—Fifty-fifth Annual General Meeting.

The election of Commander D. R. Hogarth as Chairman, Col. Sir Charles Close as Hon. Treasurer, and Dr. E. W. G. Masterman as Hon. Secretary was confirmed. The following were added to the General Committee: Hon. Vice-President, Col. Sir Robert Mond, the Hon. W. G. Ormsby-Gore, the Hon. Everard Fielding, Professor John Garstang, G. K. Chesterton, the Rev. P. N. Waggett, and Lt.-Col. Hope Biddulph.

Commander Hogarth in a short address announced that a long report had just arrived from Professor Garstang, giving an account of a preliminary survey which he had made at Ascalon, the site for which a permit for excavation had been granted to the Fund. Hogarth declared that this work was the most encouraging and most hopeful. Provided the necessary financial support is forthcoming, work will be commenced this autumn. Commander Hogarth pointed out that Ascalon was a site of extraordinary historical interest, covering periods from the beginning of the Hebrews down to the Crusading era. The Hon. Secretary appealed to those present to use every endeavour to obtain new supporters of the Fund.

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL.—June 16.—Mr. R. H. Hooker, President, in the chair.

Mr. W. H. Dines brought forward a paper on "The Ether Differential Radiometer." A second paper, by Professor S. Chapman and Mr. E. A. Milne, was entitled "The Composition, Ionization and Visibility of the Atmosphere at Great Heights.""SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—June 10.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

A memorial protesting against the threatened destruction of churches in the City of London was discussed and adopted (see p. 841).

Dr. G. M. Vevers communicated his "Report on the Entozoa encountered in the Animal remains which had died in the Society's Menagerie during the past Nine Months." In the absence of Professor R. T. Loiper, his exhibition of lantern-slides illustrating the experimental transmission of some Helminth infections was described by Dr. Vevers.

Dr. W. T. Calman gave a résumé of his paper "Notes on Marine Wood-boring Animals: 1. The Shipworms (Terebridae)."—Dr. P. C. Clamor's Mitchell gave an account, illustrated with lantern-slides, of his recent ethnographie trip from Cairo to Tobago, and described the character of the country and the birds and mammals seen.

ESSENTIALS IN ART

ESSENTIALS IN ART. By Oswald Sirén. (Lanc. 12s. 6d. net.)

D R. SIRÉN, the Professor of Art History at the University of Stockholm, has made himself a considerable reputation as a critic. His book on Leonardo da Vinci is better worth reading than many others that have been written on that apparently inexhaustible subject. But his new volume can hardly be said to satisfy the expectations that the title might legitimately arouse. The writer who can put forward for his generation honest and intelligible doctrine upon what is essential in art is doing the highest of possible services within his function. His task cannot be an easy one; but it is indisputably better worth while than the discovery of a few hitherto unidentified panels by one of the minor lights of the Trecento.

Of the five essays which make up the book, only the first two have any connection with the essentials in question, and both are directly concerned with a comparison between Chinese and Western European art. The two last, reprinted, with a generous supply of pictures, from the American Journal of Archæology and the Burlington Magazine, deal with the influence of the antique on Donatello, and with the identification of the works of the "Master of the lively Baby," for whose isolation from among the followers of Lorenzo Monaco Dr. Sirén is responsible; while the remaining essay treats, in rather an indeterminate manner, of the relations of religion and art during the Renaissance, largely illustrated by quotations from Alberti.

Dr. Sirén's views on Donatello and on the Maestro del Bambino Vispo—as to whose absolute merit he makes no exaggerated claims—are undoubtedly interesting; whether they were worth reprinting in this form from the generally accessible magazines in which they first appeared is perhaps open to question. But they have very little bearing on essentials. It is in the first two essays that a direct discussion of the central problem must be looked for, and in connection, not with Italian art of the fifteenth century, but with Chinese painting and criticism of a much earlier date.

There is an obvious danger in basing aesthetic theories on an art of which Western critics must still, if they are candid, admit that they know extremely little. This very lack of complete or even adequate knowledge makes it temptingly easy to find in the painting of the Far East a certainty of aim to which our own artists may not pretend. And at the same time it is pleasant to imagine that the ancient art critic of China conveyed the great secret in their writings. But if, after twenty-four centuries, we are still arguing over what Aristotle meant by katharsis, there is ample time before us to differ as to the precise meaning of Hişih Ho's ch'un yan, which as "spiritual rhythm" has had such a vogue of recent years among English writers on art. And we cannot but recognize an essential kinship between the critics of the ancient East and the critics of the modern West when we find Cheng Yen-Yuan (as quoted by Dr. Sirén) writing in the middle of the ninth century that the productions of the contemporary T'ang artists could hardly be called real painting. "Alas! the men of to-day, their art does not reach far!" Well, it has reached, with a considerably enhanced pecuniary value, at least as far as the present day.

Like many modern historians of art, Dr. Sirén devotes a good deal of space to refuting the doctrine that a work of art should be judged by the exactness of its representation of natural forms. No doubt this view often crops up in discussion and argument. The easiest way of explaining with some show of reason why you do not like a picture is to say that the legs are too long or that nobody ever saw a cow that colour. But if we pass from argument to practice, do people in general buy pictures, or photographs of pictures, because of an outstanding fidelity to nature? Do they crowd at the Academy Exhibition for a minute view of a minutely detailed still life? Surely not. They buy—or at least they used to buy—"The Soul's Awakening," and they bought it because of its "spiritual expression," to use a phrase consecrated by Cheng Yen-Yuan, and not because of the accuracy of its anatomy. In a rather more educated sphere a picture is far more often admired—or, in extreme cases, bought—because of its colour, its associations, or its decorative value. The question of fidelity to nature or the reverse comes in to dispose of the pictures which are not admired. And even so, much of the abuse which has been levelled at modern painting is really based not so much on a lack of fidelity to nature, as on a lack of any identifiable representation at all. But the Chinese painters, whose freedom from the shackles of representation is extolled, have left no doubts in anybody's mind as to whether they were depicting a sage in meditation, a flower or a misty range of hills.

The hope to find a single definite principle, or even a short series of definite principles, the application of which can always be traced in great art, is a wish-of-the-wisp which has led the surest-footed of critics into appalling quagmires. The vaguer the principle—and spiritual rhythm, at any rate in English, is a vague phrase—the more plausible the scheme may appear. But the ultimate test for any such theory lies in the generally acknowledged works of art which it would exclude. Securus judicai orbis terrarum.

The finally accepted theory of essentials in art has to find room for Jan Steen and Annibale Carracci as well as for Blake and Cézanne; for Pope (to take an antiquity much more difficult to resolve) as well as for Verlaine.

THE WELLESLEY DRAWINGS AND MINIATURES

On the last three days in June and the first two days in July Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson Hodge will dispense Mr. Francis Wellesley's important collection of pl umbago and other portrait drawings, and also a number of miniatures belonging to the same collector, together with a comprehensive series of prints and autograph letters relating to Richard Cosway. From the illustrated catalogue (price 7s. 6d.) received, it is evident that the collection contains numerous works of a high standard and a certain number of the first order.

Among the English artists represented are Cosway, Gainsborough, Romney, Downman, Hoppner, and Lawrence—Cosway being especially favoured by Mr. Wellesley, and Hoppner seen at the height of his powers in the drawing of Mrs. Delaney and the miniature of Lady Charlotte Percy. There should be much competition for Daniel Gardner's beautiful miniature of Mrs. Gwyn (Goldsmith's "Jessamy Bride"), for the portrait of Samuel Peters, Bishop of Vermont, by Gilbert Stuart (who painted George Washington), and the fine drawings by William Faithorne and John Hoskins, senior. Amateurs of the minor English miniaturists will have, moreover, an opportunity of acquiring examples by Lens, Bogle, Smart, Engleheart, Plimer, Humphry, Shelley and Robertson.

The drawings by continental artists are equally attractive. A silver point by Andrea del Sarto, a masterly study for a miniature by Holbein, a head by Frans Hals (extremely characteristic in handling), a signed sketch by Rubens (formerly in Sir Peter Lely's collection), a superb Dutch portrait, dated 1673, and signed John Hoet, with others by Gerard Dou, Cornelis de Visscher, Jan de Bray, Gravelot, Oudry, Moreau le Jeune, Greuze and Augustin de St. Aubin are bound to appeal to collectors who delight in portrait drawing as a fine art.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

SUFFOLK STREET GALLERIES.—"Pan" Exhibition of Modern Humorists.
HAMPSTEAD ART GALLERY.—Pastels and Water-Colours by William Hoggatt.
LITTLE ART ROOMS, ADELPHI.—Pictures and Sketches by Alfred J. Bennett.
BURLEIGH GALLERY.—Pictures by Margaret Lindsay Williams.
FINE ART SOCIETY RESIDENCE, INNISFAL.—Sketches and Studies by the late A. C. Gow, R.A.

The exhibition of commercial drawings arranged by the proprietors of "Pan" is depressing. It reminds us that the average Fleet Street art editor or publicity agent is a cruel taskmaster with inexorable low standards. In order to meet his requirements an artist must show truth as something presumptuous and unclear, and project himself into a fantastic world of natural effects into a selected and very restricted range of tones permeated in most cases by a dominant colour. The result is often curiously like coloured prints by artistic photographers. But whether this means that Mr. Hoggatt thinks the same thing about the world as the artistic photographers, or that the artistic photographers think the same thing about art as Mr. Hoggatt, we will not venture to decide. One thing is certain. These pictures will appeal to the wide public which finds modern art intolerably sentimental and is willing to accept discreet adumbration as evidence of poetic vision.

Devotees of sentimental painting will also find some of Mr. Alfred Bennett's pictures very likely tasteless, but the fact that they will also find him occasionally in more intellectual mood. For he is a very unequal artist who, has, it seems, not yet found himself. "Bembridge Harbour," "Near Knebworth, Herts," and the portrait called "The Brocade Hat" are the best things in this collection, and they are good enough to raise hopes that Mr. Bennett will evolve a virile art from tentative beginnings.

Miss Margaret Lindsay Williams scored a popular success some years ago at the Royal Academy with her problem picture, "The Triumph." She now attempts to repeat her success with other pseudo-symbolic pictures at the Burlington Gallery. She may possibly do so. Another portion of the Gallery is devoted to pictures by various artists, including two capital water-colours by H. Davis Richter.

The Fine Art Society is doing useful work by the memorial exhibitions of works by Academicians which it arranges periodically; for these exhibitions serve to remind us of the composition of the Royal Academy jury. One of the Society's galleries is now hung with pictures by the late A. C. Gow, R.A. To the British visitor the exhibition presents a spectacle sad indeed, but so characteristic of the lower strata of British painting that it fails to move us to surprise. But it is not an exhibition to which one would take an intelligent foreigner interested in British art. It might raise embarrassing questions about the painter, the institution which made him a member, and the public which, presumably, encouraged him.

ENGRAVINGS

On Monday, June 7, and the two following days, Messrs. Sotherby were selling engravings from the collection of Mr. J. P. Headlam, the chief prices being: 47 out of 90 of the so-called Tarocchi cards by Mantegna, £368.8.0; Giovanni Mocetto, The Baptism of Christ, £132; Jean Racine, Akhnaton and Eve, £136; St. Jerome in his Cell, £122; Melancholia, £151; The Knight and Death, £235. M. Schongauer, The Crucifixion, £131; V. green, after Rembrandt, Prince Rupert, £135; C. Meryon, Le Petit Pont, £145; A. Zorn, Madonna of the Streets, May £169; Madame Olga Briti, £260; Mon Modèle et mon Bateau, £149.

Music

PUCCINI'S "TRIPTYCH"

THERE is a remark of Emerson's which Sir Henry Hadow loves to impress upon his audiences, to the effect that the greatest genius is the most indebted man. If indebtedness were all, the essential to genius, Puccini would be on a level with Mozart. Puccini resembles Mozart more than any other composer in that he keeps a watchful eye for whatever is effective in the works of other men, and then proceeds to turn his powers of observation to account. Only whereas Mozart, when he utilizes a device from Ghezzi, from Martini or from Wranitzky, produces something that is far superior to the original and at the same time stamped completely with his own style, Puccini either accumulates without assimilating, or, if he assimilates what he borrows, lowers its artistic value to the standard of commercial success. Yet there is an essential Puccini; not all his plumes are borrowed. After all, it is hardly fair to expect a man of sixty to change his style with the fashions of the moment. It is sufficiently remarkable that he should be ready at least to try them on, however unbecoming they may appear.

The three one-act operas which were produced at Covent Garden on June 18 show that he is determined to be up-to-date. How bold and bad those strings of consecutive fifths sounded in "La Bohème" when it was new! Nowadays everybody writes them, and consecutive seconds, sevenths, and ninths as well still more licentious progressions, as the late Mr. Rockstro would have called them. Yet, somehow, when Puccini employs them, they have a strong taste of original sin. Misguided young men like Mr. Eugene Goossens make these noises, and not content with the Davis which, by such conduct, have even the effrontery to assure us that they really think them beautiful and expressive. Signor Puccini is a man of the world. He sows his wild oats, and goes on sowing more, just to show us how well- preserved his heart is. Perpetual virtue is apt to be monotonous; a little excitement now and then keeps a man fresh. But life has its serious moments, and in these Puccini is always true to his real self. Love and religion are things which no decent-minded man cares to see handled by Cubists and Vorticists, or even by Post-impressionists. On these subjects Puccini speaks a language that we can understand, for he spoke it five-and-twenty years ago. It remains unalloyed; are not these sacred things the same throughout the ages?

One reason for the popularity of "La Bohème" was that it put middle-class life on the stage and surrounded it with an aureole of sentimental music. In those days Liberalism gave way to Labour. "Il Tabarro," the first of the three operas, deals with "the workers." No doubt a Covent Garden audience enjoys operatic Socialism as much as the aristocrats of seventeenth-century Italy enjoyed the ghibes at Court life in the operas of Monteverdi and Cavalli. Michele, the bargeman, is a solemn bore with a young and lively wife. It was not surprising that she wanted to run away from the unbecoming boom of M. D'Indi Gilly's magnificent but monotonous voice. She was that devoted to her carpenter made fashionable, and needless to say, an attachment for the tenor. The opera turns on a single situation of the kind usually considered dramatic; the husband kills the lover in the dark and throws the corpse into his wife's arms. If it had occurred in a play by Webster it would have been regarded as revolting and unactable. Situations of this kind appear in operas, but it is not in such moments that music can contribute anything to the drama. Still less is one such situation enough to make the foundation of a whole opera. Accordingly "Il Tabarro" has to be kept going with a string of superfluities. The best of them is a savage and pessimistic monologue on the part of Luigi, the lover. The remainder are very obviously designed for the purpose of gramophone records, as they can all be taken out and performed by themselves. There is a comic old woman who sings one song about a cat and another about a "tiny garden," but does nothing to help the play: a ballad-singer with a harp who sentimentalizes over our old friend Mimi: a barrel-organ elaborately out of tune & Stravinsky: a pair of lovers who stroll across singing about the moon: and a big song for Mr. Dinh Gilly about the "mysterious and eternal river" which in the midst of all this affectation of proletarian realism stands out as aggressively operatic. It is all sheer waste of time. Some of it was cut in performance, and even then the opera was much too long.

The opening of "Suor Angelica," as the curtain rose on Mr. Oliver Bernard's very pretty arcade of cypresses leading to a chapel which Baedeker would have described as a neat and unpretending edifice, recalled delightfully a scene from Giordano's "Siberia" in which Easter is being celebrated by the inmates of a Siberian prison. Giordano wrote his opera on Russian themes several years before Moussorgsky became a popular idol. It is not a particularly good opera; but the scene to which I have referred, in spite of its very obvious treatment of bells and hymns, has a real sense of poetry and atmosphere. I am glad to think Signor Puccini is of the same opinion. He seems, by the way, to have become more than ever interested in Moussorgsky. There is a very Russian contour about many of his phrases. One would have thought that Moussorgsky was, of all composers, the last that anyone would want to imitate. From a composer who is Skilful, like Rimsky-Korsakov, one can steal technical devices; but technique is just what Moussorgsky never had. His only virtues are his passionate sincerity, and his faithful reproduction of the Russian language. To adopt the latter to Italian is ridiculous; the former quality is beyond any possibility of imitation. But Moussorgsky is the fashion for the moment, so in he goes along with the others into Puccini's stockpot, like the herbs which Suor Angelica cooks over her little girl-guide fire in the garden. In the midst of all this paltry chatter of nuns and novices there suddenly bursts a scene of real human feeling. The interview between Suor Angelica and her old dragon of an aunt who comes to tell her that her love-child has been dead two years is a great piece of emotional writing. For this one moment Puccini becomes sincere and genuinely moving. It is a pity that the opera does not end here; but no, Suor Angelica has to get up again to sing a lament which begins in the manner of Moussorgsky's Idiot and continues in the manner of Mascagni's Intermezzo. Signor Puccini is a well-read man—he knows his classics as well as his moderns. Finally Suor Angelica commits suicide to the accompaniment of a chorus of nuns and a miraculous appearance of the Madonna. Nuns are most useful people. You can turn them on to sing "Ave Maria" or any other words at any moment, to any chords that happen to suit the prima donna's top notes. Even in an opera there is room for humility and self-sacrifice.

The "Tristano" as it is called, seems at seventy-three; but there is no need to hurry over dinner. The third opera, however, is well worth seeing. If the composer and his publisher will consent to its being performed without the other two it ought to have a wide popularity. For once in a way Puccini has risked imitating a comparatively unsuccessful work. Unsuccessful "Falstaff" has been, in spite of being always acclaimed as a masterpiece it is very seldom performed. It was probably the political misfortunes of Italy that put an end to comic opera in the days of the Risorgimento. If the appearance of "Gianni Schicchi" signifies a return to the traditions of Logroscino and Cimarosa it is indeed welcome. Compared with "Falstaff," the actual music is superficial and commonplace, but the themes, if trivial, are very dexterously handled, and the composer shows a real understanding for that kind of comedy which can only be properly expressed in music. The first scene is a delightful example of this. The relatives of Baco Donati are assembled at prayer round the bed on which his body lies, and gradually prayer gives place to gossip, which becomes more and more excited until suddenly they all realize that they are still on their knees and subside awkwardly into the silence which is appropriate to such an attitude, only to start gossiping again a moment later with redoubled energy. Needless to say, there is in this opera too a chance for the gramophone; Mr. Burke has a very effectively written song to sing about Florence while someone opens the window to exhibit the tower of the Palazzo Vecchio painted on the back-cloth. Naturally it has nothing whatever to do with the play. But when will the Grand Opera Syndicate give us a really first-class Italian performance of "Falstaff"?

CONCERTS

An enjoyable concert was given by the Elzy Quartet at the Aeolian Hall on June 18, when pianoforte quartets by Herbert Howells, Frank Bridge and Ernest Chaussen were included in the programme, which Miss Dylis Jones completed with a group of modern English songs, among them two characteristic numbers by Parry, still in MS. The quartet are unknown to us, but they seem to have practised together, as the performance has a good deal of verve and mutual give-and-take which are so essential in playing chamer music. The piano part was rather too prominent at first, but the balance of tone improved steadily as the evening went on. A little more warmth would not have been amiss in the Chaussen.

Mr. Damrosch and his New York Symphony Orchestra complete the impression made by the string of American symphonies which have appeared for our benefit of late. These American musicians have all of them technical accomplishment in a very high degree, with a repertory of music that includes a great variety of styles. Of the real understanding of music they seem to have singularly little. Miss Mabel Garrison sings coloratura songs with admirable fluency, but without the least touch of jubilation or enthusiasm; and what is the use of coloratura if it does not express something of this kind at least, to say nothing of the more subtle emotions for which Mozart and others used it? The New York Orchestra is an orchestra of virtuosi, but its virtuosity is too much in evidence. As a trainer Mr. Damrosch is marvellous; as an interpreter of great music he is utterly uninspired. It was in showy modern works that the orchestra were at their best—for example, Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" and Mr. Powell's "Negro Rhapsody." They have cultivated very assiduously a style of playing which has been called forth by works of this type. The tone of the instruments is brilliant and piercing, but thin and wanting in mellowness or singing quality. The flutes had the piercing notes of piccolos. The brilliance of the horns was astonishing, but one missed the luscious tenderness of our own players. The whole orchestra played with incomparable precision and violentness of attack; that was of wood of which they are quite masterful. A cutting tool that pierces a block of wood instantaneously and exactly. Mr. Spalding, the violinist, possesses something more than mere American swiftness of virtuosity; he has both understanding and warmth of temperament. Mr. Powell's "Negro Rhapsody was described in the programme in terms which suggested a music quite unfit for civilized ears; when it came to performance it proved a gay and harmless piece of work, modelled on the very respectable wickednesses of M. Saint-Saëns, but hardly so well written for the pianoforte.
Drama

À PROPOS PIERROT: A RETROSPECT

The brief appearance lately made by M. Severin at the Coliseum passed without much notice. It is to be feared that the celebrated French mime failed to establish sympathetic contact with an audience to which his delicate art is an unfamiliar enigma. Since its curious craze for “L’Enfant Prodigue,” London has seldom taken kindly to pantomime, except as an element of the ballet; yet the evolution of the mute drama is an interesting page of theatrical history, and a visit from the last of the great Pierrots is an occasion for recalling some of its episodes in more detail than was possible in last week’s “Marginalia.”

Who is Pierrot? It is only necessary to turn over the pages of Maurice Saude’s “Masques et Bouffons” to realize that the famous figure with the white face and white blouse has several ancestors in the “Commedia dell’arte.” He is hinted at in the Neapolitan Policinella and Pulcinello (personages rather different from our Punch, into whom the swaggering Captain, Matamore, has passed), and more clearly foreshadowed in the clown Pagliaccio, Pierrot’s godfather, however, was Molière. In “Don Juan, ou le Festin de Pierre,” which he adapted in 1665 from an Italian “Commedia dell’arte” scenario lately played in Paris, called “Il Convitatio di Pietre,” he gave this French form to the name of the Piero or Pedrolino who appears as a comic valet in the pieces of Flaminio Scala and Pagliaccio to a fixed type in the Comedy of Masks. Thus the name, the costume and the occupation of Pierrot were already found by the seventeenth century, but the character was still at the embryo stage.

The eighteenth century saw a fierce struggle at Paris between the little theatres of the fairs and their licensed rivals, the Opera and the French and Italian comedies. Early in the eighteenth century de la Reyne, the Prefect of Police, forbade the farce to play any piece with dialogue. In attempting to protect a monopoly he gave birth to an art. Players forbidden to speak had to fall back on dumb-show. By degrees, as gesture and facial expression were developed, it was seen that here was a dramatic form with a life of its own. The memories of the pantomime of Rome were revived, and the modern mimodrame was slowly perfected. In the Boulevard du Temple, since 1656 the home of the popular theatre in all its forms, there rose in 1816 a little playhouse called the Funambules. The “liberty of the theatres,” proclaimed by a decree of 1791, does not seem to have taken full effect by this date. The law still required the performers in the Boulevard du Temple to make their entry with some acrobatic feat, to distinguish them from the actors of the large theatres. In 1828 the management of the Funambules signed an agreement with the son of a travelling rope-walker and tumbler, named Gaspard Deburau, to whom they allotted the part of Pierrot in their pantomimes. Deburau’s is the first great name in the line of the silent Pierrots.

If we examine the class of piece in which he played we see at once that the Morrisian art of pantomime suiteth Richard of Covent Garden had invented the enchanter Harlequin, with his magic wand and mask of invisibility, and selected for his companions the fairy-like, dancing Columbine, the mischievous Clown and the doddering Pantaloon. Substitute for the fantastic Venetian Pantalone, Cassandre with his snuff-box, buckled shoes and periwig, and for the rollicking English Clown the malicious, satirical French Pierrot, and you have the personnel of the Deburau pantomime. All the characters are reduced to obligatory silence, the scenic splendours and transformations which Rich could afford in his great playhouse are whittled away to a trick change or two, and the emphasis is thrown on the sly comedy of Pierrot, who cheats his rival Harlequin, plays hideous pranks on the heavy father Cassandre, and pursues without ever winning the fickle Columbine.

The scenarios of these plays are not exhilarating reading. Cuffs, kicks, pursuits, tumbles and similar horseplay make up the incidents. But what tempted artists and men of letters into the uncomfortable cellar of the Funambules was the personality of Deburau, his imperturbable detachment among the whirling buffoons, the Mephistophelian mockery of his expressions, the swift, sparing gestures that sent his enemies sprawling, the cold and sinister gleams that crossed his white face whenever he handled a sword, or a razor or poison-phial. “Acteur sans passion, sans parole, et presque sans visage,” cried Théodore de Banville in ecstasy. “qui dit tout, exprime tout, se moque de tout!”

Beneath the cynical beam of Deburau’s eye the symbolic values of the farce were revealed— the fatuity of the rich, successful lover in Harlequin, the heartlessness of the eternal coquette in Columbine, while Cassandre seemed the race of man to which age brings no wisdom.

After Deburau (1796-1846) it was possible for pantomime to break free, step by step, from the conventions of Italian buffoonery. While the English harlequinade stuck and perished in conservatism, the French mimodrame developed rapidly. M. Hugoumet, author of the delightful volume “Mimes et Pierrots,” notes that Charles Deburau (Gaspard’s son and successor) “knew how to be modern and realistic in detail; his Pierrot the conscript drilled with the needle-gun.” In fact Pierrot, now soldier, now lawyer, now baker, now dandy, now rag-picker, was universalizing himself and absorbing the traits of humanity scattered hitherto among the other persons of his world. Naïf and perverse, credulous and cunning, tender and cruel, by rapid turns elete and miserable, he stands no longer for this or that individual or class, but simply for man—man, shall we say, with the mask of pretence stripped off? The white head (which adds fearfully to the difficulties of the mime by wiping out the lines and shadows that give expression to a face) serves admirably to enforce this universality. It is the mere map of a countenance, the Platonic idea of humanity. Moreover, pantomime is in all circumstances one of the most abstract forms of artistic expression. It renders emotions in their naked simplicity. It cannot indulge in psychological analysis, but must display each passion in undiluted essence. It shows, not the loves and hates, jealousies and fears of particular persons with their special temperaments, but Love and Hate and Jealousy and Fear in themselves. It is precisely that which gives it its power and its poignancy. It seems to fulfil the Schopenhauerian formula, to pluck the eternal idea from the stream of time and pierce to the meaning of life through the veil of illusion.

Such was the royal road half-consciousy opened to pantomime by Deburau. Of his successors we have already mentioned his son Charles (1829-1873), a mime of exceptional delicacy and grace, who took the first steps in extending the scope of this art. Possessing Paul Legrand (a charming and mischievous Pedrolino), saying to renew, to the simplicity and gaiety of the old, peasant Pedrolino), Alexandre Guyon and Deridder, we reach Louis Rouffe (1849-1885), the great mime of Marseilles, in whose school M. Severin was trained, and in whom the conception of Pierrot as “l’homme blanc,” the universal man, found its full and perhaps its final realization. The fine monument which has been erected over his early grave in the cemetery of his city shows a face of an almost Canoveseque classicallty of feature, lit by a fire and intelligence not to be found in any work of Canova. Embodying in his person (so his admirers believed) the canon of the human form, he strove to find the absolute norm in gesture, the perfectly gracious and perfectly expressive movement. His disciples claim for him the merit of being the first to define and fix the gesture-code of the mime. This is an exaggeration, but he no doubt refined and enlarged it. One of the chief causes of the unintelligibility of pantomime to audiences of to-day is this rapid interchange of conventional gestures between the performers. It is not realized that a trained mime ‘speaks’ in sentences as much as an ordinary actor, and that each sentence is composed of ‘words,’ i.e., units of gesture on which the phrase is built up. This ‘vocabulary’ has to be committed to memory, and the execution of each portion of it learned with the care of a step in dancing. There are as many ways of making even the simple gesture of pointing as there are of making tribal lays, but all but two are wrong. Although the gestures of the code are not arbitrary symbols, but based on natural expressions of feeling and ordinary movements, they have been so contracted and conventionalized in the interests of rapidity and grace that they bear little more relation to their originals than the animals of heraldry. Except in places where there has been a tradition of pantomime they soon become incomprehensible, and thus the art of miming, like many other arts, has been strangled by its own technique.

M. Hugouët’s book contains a convenient fourfold classification of pantomimes. There is the ‘fairy pantomime’ based on the English tradition. ‘La Naissance d’Arlequin,’ which was played in early days at the Funambules, and is clearly an adaptation of Rich’s famous pantomime of Harlequin and the Egg, and ‘Le Beuf Enragé’ (1827), with its trick-changes by Harlequin’s wand and pursuits from scene to scene, are famous instances of this genre. More important than such adaptations is the ‘realistic pantomime’ showing scenes of popular life. This was the type of piece in which Gaspard Debranu excelled. ‘Pierrot Coiffeur’ is perhaps the best known of the realistic mimodrames, and later on C. Debaran’s ‘Pierrot Avocat’ and the saccharine ‘Enfant Prodigie.’ We reach something more modern in what M. Hugouët calls ‘la pantomime mélo-drame,’ in which Pierre holds the stage alone and, like Eugene Aram, recounts the most fearful dreams and crimes. Paul Legrand’s ‘Rêve de Pierre’ in which he introduces himself with the words, ‘I murders his little daughter’s doll, flies for his life and is shipwrecked in his own armchair, and M. Paul Margueritte’s ghastly ‘Pierrot Assassin,’ in which Pierrot re-enacts the real murder of his wife, may serve as examples of these horripilant ‘monologues.’ The last type, the ‘romantic pantomime,’ is a development of the foregoing. It makes room for a number of characters, but tends to horror in its fantasy. ‘Chand d’Habit,’ with its ghost of the old-clo’man whom Pierrot has killed in exasperation at his street-cry, and ‘Le Docteur Blanc’ with its eerie waxwork scene are two fine specimens of this class; and we ought to add to them Richépin’s ‘L’Ame de Pierrot,’ though it belongs more to literature than to stage history.

Pierrot is no longer even the abstract ‘homme blanc’; he dissolves into an impalpable riddle, a symbol of the unsatisfied yearnings of the human heart. The fable is profound, but defies theatrical representation. M. Richépin’s Pierrot is the same as that depicted in M. Normand’s poem:

Pierrot macabre et bon, haid et beau, lent et vif, Terriblement coquin et saintement naïf, Type fantasque, étrange, et qui n’est autre en somme Qu’un en rayon de lune à l’apparence d’homme.

MR. GORDON CRAIG

M. GORDON CRAIG is at once a famous and a neglected artist. His work has been well known for fifteen or twenty years, and he has an international reputation as an artist with ideas who has specialized in the art of the theatre. In theatrical circles, indeed, he is commonly credited with the pioneer ideas for all the improvements in theatrical decoration, lighting and so on which we have witnessed in recent years. He is even supposed to have invented the Russian ballet! Yet the newspapers still find it necessary to re-introduce him every five years as ‘Ellen Terry’s gifted son,’ and the British public is still waiting for an opportunity to test the full range of his powers in a series of plays produced from his designs and under his direction. Vague stories reach us of his achievements in Petrograd, Florence and other Continental cities, but the most that is vouchsafed to his own country is an occasional pamphlet and an occasional exhibition of fragmentary designs such as are now collected at Dorien Leigh’s Galleries in Bruton Street.

But fragmentary though Mr. Craig’s exhibits always are, they serve, nevertheless, to justify his reputation and to explain, in a measure, the neglect from which he suffers. For they make it quite clear that he really has ideas. We recall in an earlier exhibition a drawing which depicted Hamlet in a modern velvet coat and modern trousers, a costume which would enable the actor to deliver his soliloquies walking up and down the stage with his hands in his pockets—like a real neurasthenic. And there is a woodcut in the present collection called ‘Opheila, mad,’ which, considered as an illustration, is true to Shakespeare and to life, and which, considered as a drawing, has an aesthetic significance and life of its own. There are, moreover, undoubted possibilities in the system of manifold screens which forms a conspicuous feature of Mr. Craig’s projected reform of stage setting. But though we get an impression of Mr. Craig’s originality from his exhibits, we also get, on the other hand, impressions of his obsession with the heroic and his apparent inability to visualize in three dimensions.

Mr. Craig dreams of a vast theatre to seat many thousands of people, with actors of heroic mould, making great and noble movements in scenes ‘illumined by a light such as the spheres give us.’ And he dreams of an audience murmuring, ‘How beautiful!’ in harmoniously modulated tones. But we fear he will never see the last part, at any rate, fulfilled; for nobody would go near such a theatre who could go instead to something more intimate and individualized. For the art of a theatre is in its nature the most indeferent of the arts. It was heroic, it is true, for a moment in Greece, while it was exploited for religious purposes. But this was an artificial diversion, kindred in character to the artificial and momentary diversion of painting into iconography by the Christian Church.

And Mr. Craig reveals himself equally out of touch with the real genius of the theatre in his two-dimensional visions of the players in costume which he calls marionettes, but which could be more properly described as silhouettes. We believe that Mr. Craig is right in maintaining, as he does, that people go to a theatre to get an optical rather than an intellectual impression, that they are more interested in the actors’ gestures than in their declamation; but we are convinced that the optical impressions demanded are three-dimensional. The layman has never visualized the theatreland as a flat decorative panel peopled with shadows. And he is less likely than ever to do so in these days, when the cinematograph provides him with a superabundance of shadows.

Correspondence
THE CITY CHURCHES
To the Editor of The Athenæum,
June 16, 1920.

Sir,—The Council of the Society of Antiquaries has had under consideration for some time the threatened destruction of so many of the churches in the City of London. We have learned by painful experience that it is fruitless to pit archaeological interest against the demands of commerce. The present case is, however, not so clean-cut a matter, for other interests are involved. My Council has considered the proposal in all its aspects, and has prepared the subjoined protest. This has been passed without a dissentient voice and at an ordinary meeting which we had the advantage of hearing a statement from Bishop Brown.

I hope the terms of the protest will sound as restrained to others as they do to me.

Your obedient servant,
C. HERCULES READ,
President.

The publication of the report of the Bishop of London’s Commission on the City Churches, recommending the disuse and complete or partial demolition of no less than nineteen churches, of which thirteen are the work of Sir Christopher Wren, has created a great deal of indignation. The cases of the priestly and civic authorities are, however, considerably stronger than the objections that have been raised.

The Society of Antiquaries of London, while recognizing the need for a change in the present organization of the city parishes, is confident that by adopting the drastic recommendations of the report the Church will suffer far more than she will gain.

Greatly as we must deplore the splendid buildings destroyed by the Fire of London, their loss provided an opportunity such as seldom comes to any nation, and it was the great good fortune of England that the rebuilding of the city churches could be put into the hands of Sir Christopher Wren.

At the time of his death in 1723, at the age of 91, some fifty churches, designed by his hand, adorned the rebuilt city, a priceless and unique record of the life-work of one of the greatest English architects.

Of the building of these churches a complete account is preserved. Not only do we know the dates when they were begun and finished, but we have every detail of their cost, and what is even more valuable the name of every craftsman employed on them, whether as mason, carpenter, plumber, plasterer, smith, or in other trades. All materials for a close and critical study of the craftsmanship of the end of the seventeenth century are ready to our hands, so long as the buildings themselves are preserved.

Nor is it only in their architectural merit that their value lies. Owning to the money spent on the building of its old lines, the new churches preserved the site-plans of their predecessors, and in many cases included parts of their fabrics, presenting for us much of the topography of the medieval city which had been so completely swept away, and giving an historical continuity which added just that element of tradition and romance to which the new buildings by themselves could never attain.

Since they were built the condition of life in London has entirely changed. The homogeneous population, whose homes are elsewhere, has increased enormously. The residents have dwindled to a comparatively insignificant number. The values of the sites have gone up all proportion to what they were in the seventeenth century, while the congregations of the churches are in many cases reduced to a mere handful. Already seventeen of Wren’s churches have been destroyed, and if the present report is adopted, not less than thirty out of the original sixty will have disappeared.

Some readjustment is needed, but not one which will inflict so heavy a loss on future ages. Something of the full pecuniary value of the churches and their sites must be forgone in order to preserve what no money can buy. A redistribution of their endowments has long been overdue, but to deal with ancient and historical sites as if they were occupied by nothing better than obsolete industrial buildings is a policy which no pecuniary gain can justify.

Churches no longer needed for their original purpose, if such exist, should be put to some use which is not inconsistent with their preservation, and it is to such matters that the efforts of the Commission should be directed.

THE COST OF BOOKS
To the Editor of The Athenæum,
June 16, 1920.

Sir,—I am interested in the correspondence now taking place in your pages on the cost of books. I am interested in French books, some of which (those which interest me most) are subject to a “Majorex 100 per cent.”

This ought to mean that a book which before the war cost 1fr. would now cost 2fr., or in English money before the restrictions of the war.
THE INFLUENCE OF MUSIC
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Having a strong feeling that criticism, especially that of your reviewers, in The Athenæum has never previously reached such high-water mark as it has done at the present time, I have some difficulty in offering these few remarks. I would, however, say that Mr. Rollo H. Myers, in his endeavours to show an independent basis for art and music, appears to overreach himself (Athenæum, June 11, p. 778); in fact, to state, as he does, that the artistic faculty is a sense, such as that of smell, invalidates his whole argument. Our senses derive their name and foundation in history from the fact that we are able to localize and identify them in an unmistakable manner as having a semi-independent existence, but all philosophy has hitherto failed to define any sixth sense. Music and art have no such universal identification as the other senses, and consequently more debatable factors in our progress or development. It is because they have a dual existence, so to speak, in our physical and mental perceptions that this question, which is really an offshoot of the old dualistic controversy, continually turns up.

I see no good in shutting out moral significance from the study of art, and dragging humanitarian sentiments in, as these are too closely connected themselves, if not actually inseparable. Further, if morality be entirely eliminated from art and music, they are likely to become simply cults, much of the same kind as the collecting of stamps and old teapots, for instance. In my opinion, art, if it be judged from the great bulk of its votaries, has already got to that stage. On the other hand, I should agree with Mr. Myers to the extent of deprecating these too frequent allusions to great music, as being recognizable as such, from its moral or uplifting effects, for the reason that our moral character, such as it is, has to be formed upon much more rigid and reliable methods, and from material more directly affecting it.

The underlying difficulty in connection with this old question can readily be perceived by anyone who would trouble to localize the 'standard of beauty' in art, and, for instance, and endeavour to think this out, in the same breath as it were, with a train of reasoning on morality. The incongruity of thought is very remarkable, seeing that both of the subjects are assumedly of the highest order; but whilst most people avoid the impossibility in a very simple way by thinking of the subjects at different times, the philosopher suspects that what incongruity there is rests with our own premises.

Yours faithfully,
Montague Summers.

A MODEL STORY
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—The liberty which you give your correspondents to criticize your contributors is evidence of an editorial courage which is as rare as it is stimulating. Yet I cannot help thinking that on occasion you allow too wide a latitude. An instance of this is A. S. R.'s letter in The Athenæum of June 11, criticizing your review of Mrs. Sedgwick's recent novel.

The method of criticism employed by your contributor (K. M.), so far from being an indulgence of personal vanity, seems to me one of the utmost subtlety and value. If it were not as impertinent to praise as to criticize your contributors on general grounds (though it is justly legitimate), I should say that he had invented an entirely new method of dealing with modern fiction. In no other reviews of novels is a sense of the quality of the work so precisely given. There is never a bald judgment, yet somehow one knows exactly the value of the novel criticized. More strangely, one has an uneasy certainty of having read the novel.

Yours faithfully,
William Henderson,
M. SAURAT deserves the thanks of his readers for having at length dissipated the prejudice which has held for a century the personal Milton such a conditional position. The fact that the mythology of "Paradise Lost" is merely puerile, or, to state the error in a manner in which its absurdity will be clear, that Milton's thought is as feeble as his conceptions are sublime. The truth is—M. Saurat leaves one with no doubt about it—that Milton was not only a thinker, but a thinker habitually acute and occasionally profound. For the general failure to recognize it, he has been himself, perhaps, the most to blame. He did not express his ideas; he smothered them under the rhetoric of his pamphlets and the mythology of his poems. The one systematic philosophical work which he wrote, the "Treatise on Christian Doctrine," is rendered unreadable by the number of Scriptural quotations which it contains. Fate helped to make its name as well as its contents obscure. Confided by Milton to Daniel Skinner, nephew of Cevicke Skinner of the sonnets, it fell into the hands of the Secretary of State, and, being by him judged dangerous, remained in the State archives until 1823. Since then, in spite of its publication in the Bohn Library, it has remained in consistent obscurity, a sort of "darkness visible," and the only one who appears to have read it is M. Saurat. The "Treatise" contains an incomplete but interesting philosophical system, with an ontology, a cosmology, a psychology and a politics. The chief value of M. Saurat's essay resides in its demonstration that when Milton was writing "Paradise Lost" he was concerned with the same conceptions which in a perfectly clear form he expressed in the "Treatise of Christian Doctrine."

These conceptions M. Saurat ranges in five chief groups. They are:

1. L'idée du Dieu-Infini et non manifesté en qui se forme le Fils-Créateur et création à la fois, en qui se forme enfin le Christ, l'Ensemble des êtres.
2. L'idée de ses volontés libérées par le retrait de Dieu, et l'union de l'idée d'intelligence à l'idée de liberté, qui constitue une preuve originale du libre arbitre (l'intelligence est impossible sans la liberté).
3. L'idée de la matière divine, impérissable et bonne, part de Dieu, et dont tout sort spontanément, de sorte que l'âme séparée du corps n'existe pas; que tous les êtres sont en leur substance parties de Dieu, organisées en une gradation évolutive, sans différence entre les choses, les animaux et les hommes;
5. L'idée de la liberté créatrice, basée sur la boule de l'être normal formé de la matière divine, et sur la présence en chacun des regénérés de l'Espirit du Dieu même: l'Intelligence.

Of these five groups of ideas, the first, says M. Saurat, "n'a guère d'intérêt qu'au point de vue de l'explication de Milton, et aussi le cinquième; le second contient une conception philosophique de la nécessité de la liberté qui est intéressante et originale dans l'histoire de la philosophie, et la troisième contient les germes d'une conception de l'univers en harmonie complète avec les vues de la science moderne, et les principes d'un panthéisme rationaliste d'un intérêt encore actuel; le quatrième contient une vue de la nature humaine profonde au point de vue dramatique, et éternellement valable, étant fondée sur des réalités permanentes de la psychologie de l'homme."

These ideas, according to M. Saurat, form the main articulations in the skeleton of Milton's philosophy. That it is a lively and interesting skeleton few would deny; unfortunately the body itself is so unwieldy and so shapeless that the only means of discovering its true lines is dissection. M. Saurat has not only had to read Milton; he has had to investigate him as well. He has had to correlate passages, to illumine what is obscure in the light of what is unmistakable, to find the essential expressions of the poet's thought, and to arrange these in clear order. He has thus, however, and to good purpose, explained away anything—a fact that is creditable both to Milton and himself. The conclusion to be drawn from these labours is clear: it is that Milton was a considerable thinker, but that he was inarticulate. As a poet he did most certainly command the language of poetry; as a thinker he commanded only that of rhetoric and abuse.

When M. Saurat compares Milton with Descartes and Spinoza therefore, when he says that "Milton a sa place dans l'histoire de la pensée européenne, à côté de la grande école classique française du XVIe siècle, dans la courant philosophique de Descartes à Spinoza, dans l'atmosphère littérale de Corneille," he arrogates to Milton a position which he does not deserve, and to which, it is clear from his writings, he did not aspire. Compared with the philosophical systems of Descartes and Spinoza all that Milton's "philosophy" amounts to is a few footnotes, a few conclusions without the reasons for them. These dogmas, though generally acute, are seldom illuminating; and they are seldom illuminating because they are not tested by actuality. They throw no light upon existence, nor does existence throw any light upon them. They are philosophical embryos which have not developed, and it is, unfortunately for them, the development, the application of a philosophical system that is generally most valuable. A light is only interesting to us where there are objects to be illuminated.

One can disagree with M. Saurat in his judgment upon Milton as a penseur, however, and admit that his study of Milton is extremely valuable. It is valuable because it proves that Milton was more than a respectable thinker, but chiefly because it demonstrates that his mythology was not merely conventional, but, on the contrary, philosophical. That this is a gain even those who refuse to find anything in poetry but poetry will admit. For the presence in "Paradise Lost" of incidents which in our time seem trivial and childish destroys frequently the poetic mood itself. But if we know beforehand what Milton meant by God, Sin, the Fall, the 'Greater Man' and the other terms he used, we shall perceive that the triviality is only apparent, and that, at any rate, it has a meaning, occasionally a profound one. If it is still an obstacle, it is at least an interesting obstacle. Most important of all, in reading "Paradise Lost" in the light thrown upon it by M. Saurat, or, rather, by Milton through M. Saurat, we understand it as Milton himself understood it. Milton does not appear perceptibly greater to us after a perusal of this volume—for his greatness was almost entirely in his poetry—but he is infinitely more interesting.

At the end of the war, on the 31st of October, 1918, the library of the University of Nancy was destroyed by an incendiary bomb, and the English section in particular suffered heavily. Not a single volume remains of the works of such standard English authors as Carlyle, Dickens, Meredith, Scott, Matthew Arnold, Robert and Elizabeth Browning, Fielding, Smollett, Richardson, Jane Austen, Swift, Pope, Smollett, and others. Efforts are being made by the University of London to assist the University of Nancy in re-establishing its library after the ravages of the war. Already about 500 volumes have been collected for this purpose, and an appeal is now made to all who are in a position to contribute books, to send them to Mr. Reginald A. Rye (Goldsmiths' Librarian, South Kensington, S.W.7). Gifts of money for the purchase of books will also be gratefully received.
WAR AND ART

LA DANSE SUR LE FEU ET L’EAU. Par Elie Faure. (Paris, Crés. 6fr.)

"L'A DANSE SUR LE FEU ET L’EAU," though not a war book, is certainly a product of the war. Dogmatic, vehemently, even violently written, full of imagery and metaphor to the verge of obscurity, it seems Hebraic rather than Latin in inspiration. But it is a real book, filled with fire and conviction. Serious, in spite of the motto on its title-page, too serious perhaps for any lightness of touch or urbanity of manner, it is a passionate vindication of life—of life broken and vivified and glorified by war, and by love also, which is a kind of spiritual war. For from war proceeds all that is admirable. Much that is base, no doubt; but all that is admirable. War is the mother of genius. It is in the stormiest, fiercest periods of history that genius is born. The sons and grandsons of those who have returned home drunken with enthusiasm and horror and the smell of blood are our great poets, artists, discoverers, adventurers. The peaceful Utopia of the Socialist fills M. Faure with disgust. Such a condition of things would be, to him, a thousand times more atrocious than our present unrest. Universal happiness would kill joy, would kill hope, would kill generosity; and humanity, weighed down by it, would sink into a state of stagnation and spiritual death.

Above all, there would be no more art, and the artist is the hero, the saviour of the world. Art is the Holy Spirit seeking to realize itself. The Holy Spirit does not descend from God to man; it rises from the heart of man to give life to God. Art is the creator of religion as of every other spiritual force, and religion does not bring peace, but war. Every idealist is the creator of strife and suffering, but from this strife and suffering spring the masterpieces of art. There must be hunger and thirst and massacre before the Promised Land of Moses can be torn from those who hold it, and to keep it endless wars must be waged: but, in return, we get poems deep and pure as the wells of the desert. Jesus appears, disclaiming the material world, pointing the way to Heaven; and behold, all the pagan gods are shattered in their temples, libraries are burned, the wisdom and beauty of Greece forgotten; but, in return, we get the art of the Middle Ages, its cathedrals and Madonnas. A German monk translates an old book to show that it does not say what other priests of God pretend it says. Fires are kindled, victims burned at the stake; but, in return, we get "Hamlet," "Don Quixote," Pascal, Rembrandt.

So it has been through all time. "I come not to send peace, but a sword." War is neither just nor unjust, moral nor immoral. Such conceptions do not count. What matters is the spirit of passionate life, the creative spirit. It has been always thus, and always will be. The heart of man has not changed from the beginning. Material progress there may be: for the rest, we move in circles and return ever to the point we started from. Those who are in possession must in the end be ousted by those who are not in possession, because the longing for possession gives birth to a more ferocious courage than the desire to retain. Civilizations arise and disappear. The world is a world of motion, and any attempt to arrest movement is stupid and unavailing. The younger generation is ever knocking at the door, and at the faintest tap M. Faure would fling it wide. All is tragedy, but we must accept it in the spirit of joy. "Il suffit qu'un monde lyrique jaillisse du sein d'un grand peuple pour justifier les carnages d'une guerre et les fureurs d'une révolution. Qui consent à cela est libre." M. Faure is libre.

MONTMARTRE AT WAR

BOB, BATALLONNAIRE. Par Pierre MacOrlan. (Paris, Albin Michel. 4fr. 90.)

PIERRE MacORLAN belongs to the same "équipe," as each would call it, as M. Francis Carco, but he is less sombre, less influenced by Russian tradition, and appears to take himself much less seriously. His people are pleasant to encounter. Bob, the little Montmartrois, despite the fact that he finds himself in that rather grim disciplinary corps the "Infanterie Légère d’Afrique," otherwise known as "les Joyeux," is an innocent and almost pleasing figure after the stark ferocity of M. Carco's Marcel Bovou.

He has painted here a really very skilful picture of war from the point of view of the man in the ranks. It has neither the propagandist cheerfulness of "The First Hundred Thousand" nor the propagandist horror of "Le Feu." There is nothing artificial in M. MacOrlan's war. Artificiarily devoid of thought and purpose, Bobette, who lives in a little flat, has a zinc tub in her kitchen and no curtains to that kitchen window, and hangs a canary's cage beside the gas-meter. M. Fabiano draws her, having her tub, in La Vie Parisienne at least once a fortnight.) If all war novels had been as honest and as true as this the public would have wearied of them less speedily.

Bob is at his best when he is no longer "batallonneur," after his exchange, obtained through a citation and general good conduct, to a regiment of the line, and afterwards to the Colonial infantry. It is then that he begins to develop, largely through the influence of his friend Thomas Buridan, a most amusing philosopher. Buridan is the eternal type of the soldier of fortune, whose evil chance it has been to fight in a war not made for soldiers of fortune.

—Nous vivons, continua Buridan en se grattant les joues, dans des temps bourgeonnant désordonnés pour la logique. Au feu, nous savons boire de la gâne, et de la gâne bu, taur, ce qui est tout dire. Et vise-moi la gueule des types qui doivent tuer. C'est la guerre. Au cantonnement, sans tenir compte de l'exaltation de la lutte et des mauvais instincts déviés qui nous perturbent en ce temps d'être dévorés par les bons, il faut boire du lait et se conduire comme des moines de fraîcheur et d'innocence. Voilà où les choses commencent à devenir moches. Vois-tu, mon pauvre Bob, quand le soleil se lève en pays conquérant et qu'il a taillé, il peut calmer petit à petit ses mauvais instincts surrénalisés dans les villes dressées devant son effort. Il y apaise sa soif et retrouve son équilibre.

Nous, après avoir connu le goûter du sang et de la mort, nous rentrons à l'arrière dans des villes sacrées. Il ne faut pas toucher une poule et c'est les marchands qui nous envoient.

One of the curses of war literature has been, as we have hinted, the tendency of authors to put into the mouths of soldiers the sentiments which they consider they ought to entertain. If the writer be a militarist, the soldiers spout super-patriotic nonsense. If he be an anti-militarist, they spout super-decadent nonsense. Little of either was talked among real soldiers, and these soldiers in this book are above all things real. They live and talk and act as French soldiers lived and talked and acted during those four and a half years of madness.

It is, chiefly, the talk in this book that we have turned over as one turns over something tart with the tongue. Of five years' service, infinitely the happiest months we know were passed with French troops, and with French Colonial troops for the most part. We had forgotten the slang. This book brings it back, in snatches of talk heard about fires or from the dwelling of the telephonists; and with it seems to come the smell of savoury meats from dug-out kitchens, the taste of Algerian cigarettes, the burn of "gâne" in our throat. M. MacOrlan has created a nostalgia in the spirit of one reader at least. As Bob would put it: il nous faut le cafard.

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in each represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

McCabe (Joseph). IS SPIRITUALISM BASED ON FAITH? The evidence of Sir A. Conan Doyle and others drastically examined. Watts (1920). 7 in. 188 pp. paper, 3/ n. 135.9

The two favourite points against critics of spiritualism are that the new religion has brought consolation to untold thousands, and that the quantity of fraud is exaggerated. Mr. McCabe, with his command of damning facts and ruthless logic, has dealt faithfully with Raymondson, and exposed the trickery which sufficed to convert Sir Conan Doyle and others.

*McDougall (Wilfrid), THE GROUP MIND: a sketch of the principles of collective psychology, with some attempt to apply them to the interpretation of national life and character ("Cambridge Psychological Library"). Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 9½ in. 320 pp. index, 21/ n. See review, p. 834.

200 RELIGION.

Walpole (George Henry Somerset), Bishop of Edinburgh. PROPHETS AND PRIESTS; or, FACING THE FACTS. Scott, 1920. 8 in. 112 pp, 3/ n. 280.1 Bishop Walpole would aim at reunion of the Churches through Lord Hugh Cecil’s reduction of the great divisions to four—the Papal, an Episcopal Church, a Presbyterian Church, and a Congregationalist Union of the Churches. His own strongest point is the need for purifying sacerdotalism by the prophetic spirit—in other words, finding a place beside the traditional catholicity and ritualism of the Catholic Church for the individuality and freedom of Protestantism. Apparently, by ‘prophecy’ readers are to understand what in art is called “inspiration,” and in the pulpit “power.”

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Beck (M.), ed., THE PIONEERS OF LAND REFORM: THOMAS SPENCE, WILLIAM OSGILVIE, THOMAS Paine ("Bohn’s Popular Library: Social-Economic Section," 81), Bell, 1920. 7 in. 218 pp. 2/4 n. 333 These essays by Speace, the author of "Single Tax," advocated much later by Henry George; Osgilvie, agriculturist, and a professor at Aberdeen University; and Thomas Paine, the author of "The Rights of Man," were issued together for the first time in "Bohn’s Popular Library.

Cunningham (Charles Henry), THE AUDIENCE IN THE SPANISH COLONIES, AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE AUDIENCE OF MANILA (1583-1890) ("University of California Publications in History," vol. 9), Berkeley, Cal., Univ. of California Press, 1919. 10 in. 488 pp. bibliog, index, 325.4605 A study of the history of Spanish colonization, showing that political life and power were vested chiefly in three institutions: the Audiencia, the office of Captain-General, or Viceroy, and the Church. By the Audiencia, which had legislative, administrative, and other functions, and the Viceroy, the royal interests were represented; while the Church, besides exercising great political power, endeavoured to effect the conversion of infidels, as well as subsequently to take care of their souls. Professor Cunningham’s instructive dissertation is concerned not only with the Audiencia, but also with its relation to the other governmental factors, and to various legal, political, social, and ecclesiastical problems that arose in the colonics to which the study mostly refers. A comprehensive bibliography is appended.

In this handy booklet the final report of the Committee is reviewed and expanded, and the collective proposals set out in italics and heavy type, so that the problem can be quickly grasped. What is wanted now is a vigorous crusade led by people who can make themselves read—or heard—and can bring the question down from the sphere where hideous phrases like ‘non-vocational,’” “extra-mural,” and “intramural” envelop it with an academic atmosphere of abstraction and pompous technicality.

Thurtle (Ernest), MILITARY DISCIPLINE AND DEMOCRACY. Preface by George Lansbury. Daniel, 1920. 7 in. 100 pp., 2/ n. 355.2

Another denunciation of the system by which the non-combatant professor sends the young men to fight under terrible penalties. The two writers would do away with the demoralizing and expensive system of the army contract, and have a real voluntary army, in which soldiers would be treated as free men with power to cancel their engagement. Wars would, the authors believe, then be possible only when the people were unanimous in a just cause.

400 PHILOLOGY.

Certainly, a methodical handbook to what may be termed Cockney French has been badly wanted, and no doubt this, which claims to be the first to supply the need, will be useful to the strangers, tourists, historians, ethnologists, and the novelists and playwrights for whom it is intended. As a linguistic study, its value and interest would have been greatly enhanced by some attention to etymology. Of course, many or most of the contents consist of ordinary French misused; but the exceptions are interesting problems, and so are the modes in which the orthodox phrases degenerated. Anyhow, we are grateful to M. Bauche.

700 FINE ARTS.

*Sirén (Oswald), ESSENTIALS IN ART. Lane, 1920. 9 in. 168 pp. ill., 12.6 n. See review, p. 836.

800 LITERATURE.

This series of documents, illustrating the public and private lives of four generations of country gentlemen of position and fortune, is of great value as a mirror of English social usages during the period covered by the papers, and, next to the Paxton Letters, is the most considerable collection of private correspondence of the fifteenth century which has yet come to light.” The editor’s introduction includes a history of the Storons, and a general review of the letters, as well as of the persons by or to whom they were written.

*Lee (Vernon), pseud. SATAN THE WASTER: a philosophical war trilogy; with notes and introduction. Lane, 1920. 7½ in. 352 pp., 10/6 n. 822.9

The allegorical Ballet of Nations,” a morality played in the Athenæum Theatre, which forms the nucleus of this extended drama, came out as a picture-book the second Christmas of the war, and is now provided with a prologue and epilogue, and with a long introduction and still longer notes. The whole is intended to be read. Satan, who explains that he is “the Power that Wastes,” is lessee and stage-manager: the ballet-master is Death; virtues and vices compose the chorus. As a “philosophical treatise”—so the dust-cover terms it—the book is a development of the view that the great war could have been planned only by the ancient powers of evil, the nations dancing to an orchestra of passions, noble or base. No human being can be persuaded to admit that he had a hand in bringing about such a monstrous event. Patriotism is not necessarily a virtue, but a complex of impulses, passions, and habits, that are good or evil according to their ultimate trend. As a satire, “Satan the Waster” will doubtless be effective with the intellectuals.

POETRY.

Forbes (Helen Emily). THE SAGA OF THE SEVENTH DIVISION. Lane, 1920. 9 in. 74 pp., 5/6 n. 821.9

The intention of Miss Forbes is to memorialize the heroic Seventh Division of General French’s first army. In so far as she poetizes the facts of its history in France she achieves a consistent, if not very considerable success.

One boyish officer in sole command
Of tens where late a thousand marched Under some honoured name is her method of saying that the division went into action 18,000 strong on October 15, 1914, and was withdrawn sixteen days later, numbering only 2,000. But there are moments in her “saga” as in the quiet conclusion—

And thus

The red sun set upon that redder field—which are effective on their own account.

M. Vodoz regards the legendary paladin as the symbol of heroism—a symbol, like all great symbols, having a definite function in the human battle with fate. Roland is more than a national, he is a universal symbol, like Prometheus and Christ: as Gaston Paris showed, the poem had its greatest success abroad. The author writes in his second chapter of “Roland” from the twelfth to the nineteenth century, of the “Roland” of Alfred de Vigny; and in the third chapter, of Victor Hugo’s “Roland,” concerning which he says that Hugo’s view of the hero as a symbol of the national conscience led nowhere.

Weaving (Willoughby). DEDAL WINGS. Oxford, Blackwell, 1920. 8 in. 70 pp., 4/6 n. 821.9

Although Mr. Weaving’s observation is wholly human, it is detached from his own times to a remarkable degree. His verses have the narrow range of subject of seventeenth-century lyricism.

She hath the delicate delight,
The airy grace of birds;
And lovely as their lyrics are
Her single words, is a characteristic passage; therein, however, not quite the same completeness of success attending not one of the hundred pieces in his latest volume. Lack of spontaneity is often the peril of the lyricist who confines his attention to the graces of birds, flowers, and trees, and their shortcomings or resemblances, when compared with the grace of his own love’s embodiment. The meditative verses are distinguished by a rich and delicate imaginative insight, although his technical equipment is less fresh than his fancy.

FICTION.

Mrs. Crawford has travelled from South Africa back into the far years of the reign of Edmund of East Anglia for this, her first English historical romance, and her venture has a present of considerable success. She acknowledges her obligation to Roger of Wendover, and it is perhaps in her pictures of the life of those times rather than in her portrayal of the king’s passion for Frea, the daughter of a king of Iceland, that the reader will find interest. The character of the latter is generally turned out to be the case with the historical novelist, is shadowy. But the other maiden, Tekla, with her passion for the king, is presented with the skill that the author has shown more consistently in her earlier books.

The widowhood of Miriam Westerby is complicated by the existence of a baby. Mr. Blyth’s readers would probably have no liking for the psychological nuances required by the association of new love with an infant’s presence to remind the lovers continually of the old. As Miriam is still marriageably young and pretty, she will therefore need to get rid of the baby somehow. We are glad to be able to record that the infant dies from natural causes, the mother being Mr. Blyth’s heroine and not his villains. The way being thereby made clear for the appearance of the usual rivals, Ronald and Eustace, hero and soubrette, they not only appear, but stay right until the finish. Eustace attempts a vile outrage when the girl refuses his proposal of marriage, and Ronald has the happiness of observing that “a divine smile brought two little dimples winking out as she tightened the pressure of her arms round him.”

The fastidious reader will be inclined to put this volume aside after the first few pages, but if he persevere he may very quickly realize that the vulgarity of the author’s manner is deliberate, and very effective and moving. The story is told by the Hon. Noel Carton, who has married for money and paid the penalty. He seeks alleviation by writing a novel in secret. The method by which the real and the imaginary stories are alternated and more and more closely interwoven, until we are no longer able to distinguish between them, is original and clever. Mr. Caine’s climax is full of horror, but fascinating. Carton awakes from one of his spells of fiction-writing to find himself strangling the wife whom in real life he hates. Subconsciously he has been portraying all the time the people with whom he has actually lived, including himself. The following is a compliment to Mr. Caine to say that no one who does not read this remarkably plausible tale from cover to cover could believe it.

Foster (Maximilian). SHOESTRINGS. Appleton, 1920. 7½ in. 325 pp., 7/6 n.

The profoundly American in humour and diction for the average English reader, this narrative of an episode in the life of Mr. Tams, a "floorwalker" in a Frisco store, is never-though rather amusing. Mr. Tams, like Mrs. Boffin, is a "highflyer at fashion." He devours books on etiquette, and aspires to become one of America's dollar noblemen. He and other inmates of Mrs. Wallop's boarding-house gambled in war and made large sums of money, and go on the "burst" at a fashionable resort. Some ludicrous adventures befal the party, but in the end these very queer people lose their suddenly-acquired wealth, with the exception of Miss Minch, a shrewd lady of mature age, who manages to cling to her gains and to secure Tams as her spouse.

Goodwin (Ernest). The DUCHESS OF SIOUXA. Collins [1920]. 8 in. 281 pp., 7.6 n. The "belle dune sans merci" of old romance, whose crudities had always the effect of stimulating her lover's adoration, is here revived in the person of a youthful heiress, unmarried and marriage-shy. The worst handled of all her suitors is naturally he to whom she is most favourably inclined; but by his services in dealing with a tyrannous overlord, he finally conquers her hostility. The actors in this drama, which does not lack life and movement, are Italians of the fourteenth century.

Lawrence (C. E.). The GOD IN THE THICKET. Dent, 1920. 8 in. 256 pp., 6 n. Jan Aylmer, visionary and musician, sojourns a while among the Butterfly People of Argovic, his music and the depth of his love for one of their maidens exciting only wonder and mockery. And sacrificing in vain his gifts, mocked by the laughter of Pan, he flees this land of unseemly enchantment and soulless beings, leaving behind his broken harp.

Morley (Christopher). The HAUNTED BOOKSHOP. Chapman & Hall, 1920. 7 in. 243 pp., 7.6 n. 813.5 This series of chats in a bookshop, with a thin and obvious love-interest as a connecting thread, depends largely for its effect on the attraction the reader may be inclined to feel for the chief character, a quaint bookseller in Brooklyn. But if the reader is unable to respond to wiles cast in the form of bookish exclamations put into the old man's mouth, such as "By the bones of Tauchnitz!"; or if he is unable to feel partial towards an atmosphere created largely by sprinkling the dialogue with book-titles and by christening the shop "Parnassus at Home," and the bookseller's dog "Brock" (short for Boccaccio), he will certainly not be able to combat a growing dislike for the recurrent corny-coperny phrases. If, however, he is a reader who is still thrilled by the very mention of books he will revel in Mr. Morley's pages. He will batton on tities and scrappy literary estimates. And he will overlook the fact (which the other kind of reader won't) that in the moment that a wealthy man's daughter enters into an apprenticeship to the bookseller we guess all that will happen to her when she arrives among the books—and the bookworms.

Ross (Sir Ronald). The REVELS OF ORKERA: a medieval romance. Murray, 1920. 7 in. 400 pp., 7. n. Sir Ronald Ross has selected a theme which has some affinity with those two dissimilar romances "The Sorrows of Satan" and "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." His hero, an amiable dwarf exposed to cruel humiliation and insult, accuses the officer of service made him (in all good will, apparently) by the fallen but repentant archangel, and develops, in consequence, a dual personality, much to his moral detriment. Switzerland in the fifteenth century is the scene of this story, which by its variegated medley of the supernatural, the aesthetic, and the grotesque, recalls the old Scotchwoman's fantasy on a certain personal subject: "It's rich feeding, nae doot, but mixed, and no very tasty."

Wells (Carolyn). RASPBERRY JAM. Lippincott, 1920. 8 in. 314 pp., $1.60 n. 813.5 Fleming Stone is an American Sherlock Holmes, but he has the advantage of being assisted in his researches not by Dr. Watson, but by a preternaturally "smart" New Yorker aged sixteen, who finds the clue to a murder mystery in a stain of raspberry jam. The story, though far from probable, is well constructed and mildly interesting, the secret being well preserved, and the solution unexpected.

Barbusse (Heurt). LA VIE DANS L'ARME. Paris, "Clarté," 1920. 7 in. 151 pp. paper, 3fr. 940.314. The new society "Clarté" is founded to deliver the people from the ignorance and inertia which, M. Barbusse and his comrades allege, enabled Governments, capitalist-led, to fool and exploit them and to make profit out of the war. Those who have come back from the war find society in chaos and the unrest that presses revolution. "Clarté" will show them that the fundamental cause of all this evil is the domination of one class, the capitalists, and that there can be no remedy till the taskmasters and law-makers are overthrown.

Eagerand (Fernand). LA BATAILLE DE LA FRONTIÈRE (Août, 1914). Bréil, Paris, Bossard, 1920. 9 in. 267 pp., 2 maps, 7fr. 50. The district of Bréil supplied the Germans with iron and other minerals during the war, which, the writer contends, was prolonged several years through the lack of foresight of the Government and the incompetence of the Grand Quartier Général, which allowed it to be lost in the first phase. He gives a highly detailed account of the movements of the armies, to show that there was no tactical reason why the district should have been abandoned.
